Existential Psychology

🕒 8:30 AM - 6:30 PM, Feb 7

📍 Virtual

Preconferen...

“Existential ecology: Culture, self, and identity” will be the theme of our 6th consecutive Existential Psychology Preconference. Lewis Gordon (U.Conn.) expert on Black Existentialism, will deliver the Special Philosophical Address. Steven Heine (UBC), expert on cross-cultural psychology, will deliver the Research Keynote Address on existential cultural psychology research. The event will also feature five Invited Research Talks: Daphna Oyserman (USC) will discuss identity-based motivation and cultural interpretations of difficulty and possibility; Katherine Du (U.Wisconsin) will discuss variations in the benefits and costs of authentic self-expressions across cultural contexts; Kate McLean (Western Washington U.) will discuss narrative identity development, overarching cultural narratives, and their dynamic interaction over time; Toni Schmader (UBC) will present research on state authenticity as fit to the environment (SAFE); and Shigehiro Oishi (U.Chicago) will discuss the cultural dynamics of meaning. Additionally, the event will feature an awards ceremony as well as a data blitz and poster session, which will cover a broad range of existential psychology topics. The science of existential psychology focuses on core issues of “being” and “becoming” in human nature and social life. These issues include such key existential concerns as: freedom, authenticity, and moral responsibility; awareness of mortality; culture, self, and identity; isolation, uncertainty, and shared reality; and the quest for meaning and purpose in life.

The Psychology of Extremism

🕒 8:30 AM - 4:30 PM, Feb 7

📍 Virtual

Preconferen...

The idea of the pre-conference is to bring together researchers from various areas of study and create a platform to exchange thoughts and ideas that can help define the domain of extreme behavior and establish it as a fruitful area of study across levels and disciplines. This year's preconference will focus on self-sacrifice in different realms (e.g., religion, career, sport, helping, relations, etc.)

Sustainability Psychology

🕒 8:30 AM - 4:30 PM, Feb 7

📍 Virtual

Welcome to the 13th annual Sustainability Psychology Preconference! This year's theme is "Individual and Structural Approaches to Addressing Climate Change." As sustainability psychology researchers, we often focus on individual actions but overlook the impact of larger structural changes necessary to create and maintain a sustainable planet. This year's preconference showcases cutting-edge research that extends the predominant scope of sustainability psychology. We shine a spotlight on work that includes both top-down, research that focuses on structural change, policy and key decision makers, and bottom-up, research that emphasizes the need for changes in our day-to-day lives. Our preconference is open to participants at all career stages and professional backgrounds and will include two keynote addresses, an invited speaker session, single-presenter talks, blitzes, and a happy hour event.

Conflict and Conflict Resolution

🕒 8:00 AM - 12:00 PM, Feb 8

📍 Room 1A, Upper Level

Preferen...

Conflict is ubiquitous across time and place and has important consequences for everyone involved. This preconference will bring together eminent and rising scholars to share recent theory and findings in the area of conflict and conflict resolution. We invite scholars studying the precursors, nature, and consequences of interpersonal, organizational, and intergroup conflict, as well as strategies for managing past and ongoing conflict in more constructive versus destructive ways. We also encourage presentations addressing multiple goals of conflict resolution, such as justice, equity, performance, relationship functioning, personal well-being, and the reduction of prejudice and discrimination. Sessions will be structured to permit constructive discussion of research, future directions, and practical implications for interventions. In addition to full research talks, this preconference will feature a data-blitz session. We look forward to seeing you there!

Misinformation & Belief Science

🕒 8:00 AM - 12:00 PM, Feb 8

📍 Room 1B, Upper Level

Preferen...

The Misinformation & Belief Science preconference will bring together scholars and practitioners who work on understanding and tackling misinformation in society from multiple subdisciplines. The presenters will focus on novel theoretical, methodological, and empirical insights into the belief, sharing, and spread of misinformation, and associated behavioral changes. It will also investigate how people come to believe new information (both true and false) and how those beliefs can be changed or altered, and the connection (or lack thereof) between beliefs and behaviors. There will be a focus on why people are susceptible to misinformation, the development and evaluation of counter-misinformation interventions that may correct or prevent false beliefs, and the cross-cultural replicability of the findings. The day will include a diverse series of talks by misinformation scholars, a skill-sharing session, blitz talks from Early Career Researchers, and a poster session, along with ample time for discussion and meeting new colleagues.

Preconferen...

The Moral Psychology preconference will bring together some of the most exciting work being done on “morality” by scholars from around the world. Explicitly welcoming methodological and theoretical pluralism, this preconference will provide a unique space at the SPSP for a focused day on the latest theoretical and empirical work on human values, judgments, and decisions in moral contexts—and how this may impact both pressing societal issues and debate in ethical theory.

Close Relationships

🕒 8:00 AM - 5:00 PM, Feb 8

📍 Room 6F, Upper Level

Preconferen...

The Close Relationships preconference is back with all of the traditional content, including invited addresses from Jenny Olson (Indiana University), Gurit Birnbaum (Reichman University IDC, Herzliya), Peggy Clark (Yale University), and our Rusbult Early Career Award winner. Our special session discussion panel this year will focus on why and how close relationships researchers can best contribute to worldwide efforts to improve social connectedness to promote better health and well-being, and will include expert panelists Julianne Holt-Lunstad (Brigham Young University & Global Initiative on Loneliness and Connection), Kiffer Card (Simon Frasier University & Canadian Alliance for Social Connection and Health), Liz Necka (NIH National Institute on Aging), and Galena Rhodes (University of Denver and Thriving Families). In addition, the preconference features new opportunities to present your work and connect, including a student networking breakfast event and a poster session.

*Preconferen...

The Gender Preconference brings together emerging and classic approaches to the social psychology of gender. Presentation formats include a keynote talk, symposia, data blitzes, and posters. Invited speakers will include early career rising stars through established scholars. This year's symposia will focus on gender identity and allyship from an intersectional perspective, and on gender bias in language. Data blitz sessions will feature 5-minute talks that highlight innovative work on "hot topics" of interest. The program will also include a poster session that offers additional opportunities for presenters to share their gender research in a relaxed atmosphere. We invite applications for data blitz talks and posters from students and academics at all stages of their careers. To celebrate and showcase the scholarship of emerging gender scholars, we will have two awards for graduate student poster or data blitz presenters.

Intervention Science: Harnessing Psychology to Address Real-World Social Problems

🕒 8:00 AM - 5:00 PM, Feb 8

📍 Room 6D, Upper Level

Preconferen...

The Intervention Science: Harnessing Psychology to Address Real-World Social Problems preconference brings together researchers interested in turning psychology outward to understand and address pressing societal issues. In 2024, we will showcase intervention research using diverse theoretical and methodological approaches to tackle social problems. Our preconference will involve discussions on how to develop rigorous interventions with research that bridges the gap between basic and applied perspectives, as well as how to translate such research into scalable interventions that have real-world impact.

Sexuality

🕒 12:00 PM - 5:00 PM, Feb 8

📍 Room 14B, Mezzanine Level

Preconferen...

The theme of the eleventh annual SPSP Sexuality Pre-Conference is “The War on Sex.” This theme was chosen in response to accelerating legislative threats to sex education, sex research, LGBTQ+ rights, and reproductive rights. Several US states have enacted restrictions on the information students can be taught about sex, access to abortion, the rights of sexual and gender minorities, and the ability of sex researchers to even ask questions. Presentations from a diverse group of scholars will address the current climate and explore opportunities for advocacy to promote sexual health, advance equality, and preserve academic freedom.

Evolutionary Psychology

📍 Room 1B, Upper Level

*Preconferen...

The SPSP Evolutionary Psychology (EP) Preconference—in its 22nd year—provides a forum for discussing cutting-edge research examining how psychological processes have been shaped by recurring physical and social challenges faced over human evolutionary history. Regularly among the top-attended preconferences, the EP Preconference attracts established researchers, new investigators, and graduate and undergraduate students from around the world. Invited speakers present full-length research talks; slots to present data blitzes and posters are competitive, featuring scholars across career levels. Presentations cover a broad range of topics, including cooperation, health, morality, aggression, social cognition, mating, and personality in both humans and non-human species. The EP Preconference fosters interdisciplinary collaboration between researchers from psychology and neighboring disciplines like anthropology and biology, and it provides an optimal forum for introducing psychologists to the ways evolutionary theory can be used to cohere disparate findings, generate novel predictions, and ultimately enhance our understanding of behavior.

Psychology of Media and Technology

🕒 12:30 PM - 5:00 PM, Feb 8

📍 Room 3, Upper Level

Preconferen...

Digital technologies are deeply embedded in our everyday lives. We engage with a diverse set of devices, platforms, and agents to communicate, navigate our environment, and seek information or entertainment. As a result, social scientists are at the forefront of a dynamic and difficult undertaking: to understand the psychological antecedents and consequences of technologies that are changing each year. In this preconference, researchers from psychology and communication share their work and ideas for this area of research. The theme for the 8th meeting will highlight the importance of communication and the self, illuminating the dynamics of online interaction and self-processes. Beyond the central theme, the invited symposia, data blitzes, and posters will explore a diverse range of topics connected to core areas of social and personality psychology, allowing participants to engage with the wide spectrum of research (and researchers) falling under the umbrella of media and technology psychology.

We will present tools and strategies that individuals in academia can use to improve racial equity in their communities and academic groups. This presentation will include a discussion about organizing antiracist "Learning and Action Groups" which are groups of individuals who meet intentionally and often to learn about antiracist topics and to engage in actions to improve inequities. We address why consistent learning about antiracism in academia is important and how this learning can be used to leverage our power to enact change.

We will share resources we have gathered across several years including a BIPOC researcher listserv, inclusive presentation strategies, and others. We will discuss ways to implement these tools in practice.

Finally, we will organize a panel of presenters who have integrated antiracist practices in their work as academics to speak on their experiences. We plan to acquire funding to compensate presenters.

Did you know that the National Institutes of Health (NIH) funds basic and applied social and personality psychology projects? In this panel, social and behavioral scientists from the NIH will review the resources and information most relevant to SPSP attendees of all career stages. Panelists are Program Officers from various NIH Institutes, Centers, and Offices, including the National Cancer Institute, the National Institute on Minority Health and Health Disparities, and the Office of Behavioral and Social Sciences Research. Panelists will discuss ongoing and emerging personality and social psychology-related research interests and funding priorities, Notices of Funding Opportunity (NOFO) of interest to SPSP constituency, and grantsmanship tips. They will highlight many resources that NIH offers social scientists, including fellowships for trainees (including those specifically focused on increasing the diversity of the academic workforce), mid-career training programs, and public-use datasets and repositories. They will answer questions from the audience, including about the ways in which attendees research might fit within the mission and priorities of NIH Institutes, Centers, and Offices.

Advances in the Measurement of Morality

Morality

Methods/Statistics

Morality deserves to be scientifically studied, and scientific study requires measurement tools. But can we measure something that seems so subjective, elusive, and difficult to define? Our symposium takes on this challenge and highlights cutting-edge best practices for measuring moral judgments, values, and character. The first speaker argues that it would be difficult to validly measure a person's overall morality, but that there is more promise in measuring specific dimensions of morality (e.g., kindness, honesty). The second speaker demonstrates that standard Likert-type measures can produce implausible conclusions about judgments of relative moral severity, and shows how to avoid this issue by applying methods from sensory psychophysics. The third speaker presents advances in the measurement of moral foundations using self-report and text-analytic tools. The fourth speaker emphasizes the importance of going beyond surface-level behaviors by uncovering motivations for honesty and dishonesty in everyday life. Although measuring morality is far from straightforward, these talks show that it can be done with some thoughtfulness and a diverse methodological toolkit.

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Social Justice

Social psychological tradition often focuses on personal bias, or the bias that exists solely in the minds of people. In recent years, however, as discussions of structural privilege and bias have increased, many lines of research have emerged on structural bias, from the awareness of structural bias to the pushback against structural remedies to its biased effects on social groups. This symposium bridges the gap between personal bias and structural bias, in three distinct areas of research. The first talk focuses on people's understanding of privilege and how structural explanations of privilege relate to equality efforts. The second talk examines how organizational debiasing initiatives are received, and how the initiatives may uphold, rather than eradicate, structural inequalities in the workplace. Finally, a third talk presents a unique conceptualization of structural bias, regional bias, that predicts numerous inequalities among various social groups, reinforcing that aggregated personal biases can manifest as structural biases. Across these talks, we illuminate three different interactions between the personal and the structural, to better understand bias in its many forms.

Intergroup Relations

Diversity

Ethnic studies has been contentious since its inception following the 1968 student strikes at San Francisco State University. Currently, there are more than double the number of efforts to ban or restrict ethnic studies (36 states) than efforts to expand it (17 states) (Chalkbeat, 2022). Despite this, ethnic studies may improve intergroup attitudes and promote solidarity among minoritized group members. The first 2 talks focus on the development of critical reflection (ability to name and analyze forces of inequities) through ethnic studies courses for Latinx and Native American high school students and Asian American college students, which leads to greater solidarity with Black people. Talk #3 focuses on how ethnic studies curriculum increases racism-related knowledge, which leads to an increased sense of critical agency (ability to effect change) and stronger intraminority solidarity. Talk #4 focuses on White students' willingness to confront White privilege after a diversity course. Together, these findings suggest that ethnic studies bridges group differences, rather than being "divisive" as its opponents claim. Implications for education and public policy will be discussed.

Social Cognition

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Social psychological theories are often verbal, imprecise, and therefore hard to falsify. Formal modelling provides quantitative, precise, and more falsifiable predictions. This symposium showcases four formal approaches to understanding the processes of stereotyping and prejudice. The first talk formalizes the origin of stereotypes as a multi-armed bandit problem and shows how globally inaccurate stereotypes can result from unbiased decision-makers merely pursuing their self-interest. The second talk quantifies impression asymmetry with a cognitive-ecological model and demonstrates how a positive informational ecology gives rise to predominantly negative group stereotypes. The third talk develops a pipeline that combines multiple theories of prejudice into one integrative predictive model. The last talk discusses a new approach that predicts when ingroup bias vs. status bias occur. Together, this symposium presents a wide range of formal models on topics around stereotyping and prejudice. These models complement verbal theories and advance the field toward more precise and falsifiable theorizing.

Emotion

Norms and Social Influence

Emotion contagion is a central process in groups, driving group behaviors and impacting long term well-being. While the existence of contagion is a natural part of group behavior, variance in the contagion process lies in the network hierarchy, emotion valence, the goals of specific group members, and the ways in which they communicate their emotions. In the current symposium, we examine different aspects that may impact the way contagion unfolds. Speaker 1 examines the impact of status on the association between emotion and sharing on social media, showing that negative emotions are more likely to spread for high-status individuals (vs. ordinary users) compared to positive emotions. Speaker 2 casually tests the effect of valence on emotion contagion, showing that news headlines with negative words are more likely to be consumed by users. Speaker 3 focuses on the motivational factors that affect emotion convergence in collective actions, showing that activists are motivated to increase emotion contagion to reduce their burnout. Finally, Speaker 4 shows that emotion regulation can also spread within groups in parallel with the emotion contagion process.

*Symposia Other Morality

Long before social media allowed us to reach new and wider audiences, people have been talking to one another—often about one another. This symposium showcases cutting-edge work—from developmental, evolutionary, and social cognitive perspectives—investigating how we navigate these conversations as speakers, how they impact our own reputations and behavior, and how we can use this knowledge for good. Presenter 1 explores how children navigate the double-edged nature of gossip—at once a common behavior and yet an actively discouraged one—as prospective speakers. Presenter 2 introduces The Contraposition Effect—whereby derogating a target on X (e.g., sexual promiscuity) can enhance speaker reputation (e.g., as less promiscuous), while Presenter 3 asks whether people expect such punishment of others will make oneself look good, and if these expectations can cause people to punish others unjustly. Presenter 4 shows how we can harness our knowledge of social communication for good: Getting people talking about the causes they support might be a better way to secure consistent charitable donations, especially from larger-gift donors.

*Symposia Politics Morality

An increasingly polarized political landscape has created conflict over the boundaries of acceptable behavior and free expression. As concern grows over hate speech and prejudice, so do fears of public shaming and censorship. Some see grassroots accountability while others see censorship and mob rule. We start the symposium with a discussion of how people evaluate reactions to offensive speech online. Talk 1 considers people's endorsement of criticism, censorship, boycotting, and harassment as appropriate responses to offensive speech. Talk 2 examines reactions to past offensive tweets, considering the passage of time, personal growth, political values, and personality. Our second set of talks focus on censorship of political opponents. Talk 3 considers how political orientation and target vulnerability predict political intolerance and censorship in the U.S. and Chile. Talk 4 explores the mechanisms of censorship—how perceptions of harm and lies predict when people censor their political opponents, and how an experience sharing intervention reduces censorship. Overall, these talks explore fundamental questions about the balance between moral harm and free speech.

We address challenges concerning data quality, respondent authenticity, and sample representativeness that emerge when conducting research online. The first talk delves into a case study examining the falsely reported ingestion of bleach during COVID-19, emphasizing the importance of data quality for social science and public policy. The second talk challenges the misconception of “bots” being the main culprits of poor data quality online. Our studies point towards fraudulent humans as the main perpetrators, necessitating human-focused solutions. The third talk addresses an emerging concern—the unauthorized use of AI, like ChatGPT, in survey responses. We demonstrate that clear instructions can significantly reduce AI usage, presenting an effective strategy for mitigating this challenge. Finally, we provide an insightful comparison of seven widely used online sample providers. We identify sizable variation in data quality, representativeness, and the ability to recover treatment effects, and provide a comprehensive guide to selecting the most suitable platform. Collectively, these talks offer valuable insights and strategies to navigate the complex landscape of online research.

Re-evaluating Classic Strategies for Promoting Happiness: A Post-Replication Crisis Lens

Applied Social Psychology

Emotion

Around the world, people Google “how to be happy” more often than “how to be rich.” And psychological research has documented strategies that can make people happier, from practicing gratitude and meditation to spending money on others, or simply smiling. Although these strategies have been widely disseminated to the public through books, podcasts, and TED talks, much of the research supporting them was conducted prior to the replication crisis. In this symposium, we will apply a post-replication-crisis lens to reconsider the effectiveness of these strategies for promoting happiness. The first speaker will argue that there is surprisingly little strong evidence for the value of meditation/mindfulness, exercise, or spending time in nature. The second speaker will show that there is robust evidence, however, for the benefits of spending money on others, and the third speaker will show that gratitude interventions are effective across diverse cultural contexts. Finally, the last speaker will share the results of an adversarial collaboration across 19 countries, testing the hypothesis that smiling enhances happiness (i.e., the facial feedback hypothesis).

Intergroup Relations

Diversity

Using diverse methodologies, we present new theoretical insights into the formation and implications of interracial relationships. First, in a large field study, Speaker 1 uses social networking analysis to map the quality of interracial relationships, revealing that they are less intimate than same-race relationships. Second, Speaker 2 presents three studies showing how Asian and Black Americans believe they are more attractive to White Americans than to each other, leading them to be more interested in interracial relationships with White Americans. Third, Speaker 3 presents dyadic data demonstrating that interracial White/POC couples are more likely to prioritize career and salary goals over relational goals relative to White couples. Fourth, using data from 18 million U.S. mortgage applications, Speaker 4 finds systemic housing market discrimination against interracial couples, such that these couples face significantly lower odds of having their loans approved relative to White couples. Together, these talks highlight how interracial relationships are formed, how they shape and are shaped by partner preferences and goals, and how couples' financial opportunities are restrained.

Close Relationships

Diversity

Relationship science has grown to be an influential discipline, but has historically focused on narrowly defined relationships, constructs, and processes. This symposium highlights novel methodological and topical issues that may help the field move towards a more nuanced science of relationships. Talk 1 utilizes 1762 studies to illustrate that sexual, gender, racial, and geographic minority identities remain underrepresented in relationship science, and offers suggestions for strengthening diversity and inclusivity. Talk 2 moves beyond romantic relationships and highlights the richness of friendship relationships as an important area of inquiry that can benefit relationship science more broadly. Talk 3 draws on 5 studies to illustrate how psychometric techniques can be repurposed for understanding different constructions of relational and sexual concepts across diverse relationships, including monogamous and consensually non-monogamous relationships and the relationships of heterosexual and LGBTQ+ people. Talk 4 moves beyond linear models and provides empirical evidence for how nonlinear models (curvilinear effects, within-person fluctuations, within-dyad flexibility) can reveal complex relationship processes.

Mental Health/Well-Being

Motivation/Goals

Social interactions and relationships bring us happiness, but they also bring us pain. Four talks examine how sociality can influence our well-being in strikingly nuanced ways. Our first two talks explore how the diversity of others around oneself can both hurt and help well-being. Our first talk examines how living in socio-economically diverse areas can lead to poorer well-being, through negative social comparisons amongst other processes. Conversely, our second talk finds that living in genetically diverse ecologies may enhance well-being, through reducing competition between kin and similar others. Our third talk looks at how sociality might have varying effects on different domains of well-being, showing that being single has opposite effects on life versus work-life balance satisfaction. Finally, our fourth talk presents how the importance of social relationships itself, to individual well-being, diminishes in environments with a higher prevalence of infectious diseases where social interactions may carry considerable risk. People afford both opportunities and threats to our well-being, and its exact nature varies by individual goals and socio-ecological factors.

Unpacking the Diverse Social and Emotional Factors Predicting Psychological Well-Being

🕒 9:30 AM - 10:40 AM, Feb 9

📍 Room 8, Upper Level

*Symposia

Psychological and subjective well-being are multi-determined phenomena. Across four projects with 100,000 participants, we investigate demographic (education and income), cognitive-emotional (state-of-surrender), behavioral (prosocial behavior as moderated by socioeconomic status), and interventional (8-week compassion and mindfulness meditation-based training) predictors of well-being. Implications for the global psychological health crisis will be discussed.

International Bridge Building: Theories from the Global South

*Professional Develop...

In this roundtable discussion, we address the issue of equitable collaborations and discuss the barriers and opportunities for the inclusion of researchers in the Global South, including those with lived experience in the Global South, in social psychology. In order to have valid theories with enough explanatory power to understand complex social behaviors, we should platform researchers in the Global South to ideate and explore novel social phenomena. This should be done not just within the rise of new Big Team science projects, but also outside of these. Our vision is to foster dialogue among scholars, especially those focusing on novel methodologies, theories and research in the Global South. In a pre-conference online event, we will first have speakers from the Global South discussing with us candidate social phenomena that need to be studied to understand the world. Next, we will have an in-person roundtable discussion focusing on building bridges between the Global North and the Global South. Participants are welcome to attend one or both of these events.

How to Run a Crowdsourced Megastudy

🕒 1:00 PM - 4:00 PM, Feb 9

📍 Room 11A, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

Crowdsourced megastudies involve collecting many treatments created by different people and testing them experimentally on a large sample. Megastudies can be a powerful tool for answering research questions, especially applied questions, because they identify not only whether interventions are efficacious or not, but also which interventions are most efficacious. Ironically, while a central goal of megastudies is to democratize knowledge production by crowdsourcing treatments, to date a small and relatively homogenous set of scholars have initiated megastudies themselves. To realize the full potential of megastudies, the resources to initiate and conduct them must also be democratized. This workshop aims to make megastudies a more accessible and open tool for researchers to use. We will discuss crucial steps for developing megastudies, including fundraising, recruitment, selection, data collection, and evaluation. Through presentations, open discussion, and guided, small group exercises, we will illustrate key strategies for successfully organizing a megastudy, drawing on examples from the Strengthening Democracy Challenge as well as other megastudies and team science projects.

Strategies for embodying SPSP's guiding principle by promoting the success of scholars from marginalized groups

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 9

📍 Room 11B, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

The guiding principle of SPSP is to “Monitor and dismantle inequitable systems affecting historically underrepresented communities in personality and social psychology in our organizational efforts.” This principle has the power to significantly influence the actions of SPSP members and, by extension, impact individuals in the various communities to which SPSP extends. However, the broad scope of this principle may leave individual scholars wondering what specific actions they can take to enact change. This session focuses on one inequitable system in social-personality psychology – the exclusion of scholars from marginalized groups – and shares concrete ideas for how researchers can promote equity in their research and academic communities. Suggestions will range from work that can be done by individual scholars and lab groups (e.g., promoting global exchange through international collaborations, including participants and collaborators from outside of Western contexts, engaging in inclusive citation practices) to actions influencing academic departments more broadly (e.g., implementing the Diversity Checklist for University Departments).

Applying Personality and Social Psychology Research to Address Social Challenges

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 9

📍 Room 8, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

During this session, the SPSP Government Relations Committee will be highlighting personality and social psychology research that is relevant to advocacy and community services groups, with a particular interest in local work taking place in San Diego. Representatives from local organizations (with an issue focus at any level of public life) will be invited to attend this session in order to learn about research that could advance their work, which will also create an opportunity for discussion that can inform future research. The research will primarily relate to SPSP’s advocacy priority areas, listed below, but SPSP will also coordinate with local organizations to emphasize research relevant to their work which may not be covered our advocacy priorities. Convention attendees who are interested in learning more about applying personality and social psychology research findings to social issues are also welcome to attend.

SPSP’s current advocacy priority areas are as follows: Promoting sustainable behavior and pro-environmental action; addressing systemic racism and advancing diversity, equity, and inclusion; tackling ideological polarization; Promoting societal health and well-being; and battling the disinformation epidemic.

Translating DEI-Based Research Into Action: What Works and What Doesn't?

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 9

📍 Room 10, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

As social psychologists well know, the gender gap in science persists. Women, and especially women of color, experience bias, discrimination, and harassment at multiple phases of their scientific careers.

In this roundtable session, SPSP 2024 attendees will hear from leading researchers about best practices for translating decades worth of social psychology research into action in their workplaces. Their work is revealing the nuanced and complicated nature of interventions while landing on the most effective paths forward. From more effective bias training workshops, to improved mentorship and allyship, to anti-racism and other efforts to make institutions more inclusive, this session will delve into multi-pronged and evidence-based DEI strategies.

The format will include 5-10 min of opening remarks from each of the speakers, who are social psychologists and DEI practitioners, followed by a Q&A-style roundtable discussion led by the author-science writer moderator, who will also field questions from the audience.

While the focus will be on academic science settings, the presentations will be relevant for any workplace, whether in academia, industry, or government.

A Double-Edged Sword: Benefits and Limits of Increased Transgender/Non-Binary Visibility

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 9

📍 Ballroom 6F, Upper Level

*Symposia

Gender

Diversity

Transgender and non-binary people are becoming more visible in society. Many argue that visibility is solely a positive development; this symposium presents a more nuanced depiction of visibility by examining both positive and negative aspects of visibility. Greater visibility may make attitudinal research easier by giving participants a shared set of terms for transgender and non-binary groups (Speaker 1). However, visibility does not eliminate negative attitudes (Speaker 1) and may motivate opponents of inclusion to endorse mutually incompatible beliefs (Speaker 2). Greater visibility has also allowed some trans/non-binary kids to access gender-affirming medical care, which could positively impact their mental health (Speaker 3). However, some narratives of trans/non-binary identity are more visible than others, and cisgender people are more likely to recommend gender-affirming care for people who align with the most visible narratives (Speaker 4). Together, these talks showcase timely research about trans/non-binary people in a rapidly evolving social environment not fully captured by traditional models of intergroup dynamics.

Mental Health/Well-Being

Belonging/Rejection

Social disconnection (including loneliness and social isolation) is a growing societal concern that poses numerous risks for individuals' health and well-being. The speakers in this symposium will shed light on the health implications and mechanisms of social disconnection and also present promising evidence-based solutions.

The first speaker will introduce their systematic mapping work to evaluate experimental evidence suggesting that altering social connection changes physical health. The second speaker will discuss key mechanisms leading to loneliness and the need for theoretically-informed prevention and intervention (N = 7308). The last two talks will present data on promising interventions to promote social connection, including an individual-level, prosociality-focused intervention (N = 615) and a systems-level, social prescribing intervention.

Building on their respective studies and drawing from both psychological and public health perspectives, the speakers will discuss future directions for developing, testing, and disseminating effective and easily-accessible interventions to mitigate loneliness and social isolation.

Morality

Social Cognition

Most prior work on forgiveness focuses on emotional and motivational processes within victim-offender dyads, while treating cognitive and contextual factors as secondary. By contrast, this symposium aims to provide more nuanced perspectives, highlighting the often hidden cognitive and contextual factors that may be critical in the process of forgiving. Overall, these talks contribute to our understanding of forgiveness as a complex social-cognitive process that extends beyond individual inclinations or behavioral exchange models of dyadic relationships. Talk 1 explores third-party forgiveness, finding that strong sanctioning systems contribute to forgiveness in the workplace. Talk 2 highlights the role of offenders' understanding, showing that victims are more forgiving when they perceive offenders' genuine comprehension of the harm caused. Talk 3 focuses on apology baselines and shows that victims view high baseline apologizers as more moral, leading to greater forgiveness, contrary to what behavioral habituation would predict. Talk 4 investigates offenders' (meta)perspectives and shows that forgiveness promotes shared value consensus, facilitating genuine self-forgiveness.

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Groups/Intergroup Processes

Social psychological research on educational inequality has largely focused on students' psychology, such as their mindset or sense of belonging. This symposium aims to go beyond individual students and identify contextual and ecological factors that could further contribute to educational inequality. The first talk examines whether teachers' explicit racial prejudice predicts worse academic and psychosocial outcomes for Black adolescents. The second talk reveals the prevalence of gender essentialist messages in introductory biology textbooks across US high schools. Moving beyond schools, the third talk explores whether county-level racial prejudice is associated with Black-White disparities in participation in the Advanced Placement program. Lastly, the fourth talk investigates how framing educational inequality as "opportunity gap" (rather than "achievement gap") could shift people's attention towards the structural determinants of educational inequality. Together, these talks highlight various sources contributing to educational inequality beyond students themselves, offering potential targets for intervention to reduce educational inequality.

Attitudes/Persuasion

Psychological science has historically focused on how people's attitudes and beliefs are shaped by individual cognition, personality, and culture. However, little work has systematically examined how features of one's immediate social environment might shape one's attitudes and understanding of reality. Four talks explore this gap across network, group, and dyadic levels. Using longitudinal social network simulation models, Talk 1 examines how social pressures shape prejudice within school friendship networks. Next, Talk 2 explores how shared reality within close partnerships helps to create meaning during adversity. Talk 3 continues the theme of exploring the role of shared reality at the dyadic level, showing that experiencing more shared reality with instrumental others increases the likelihood of goal success. To conclude, Talk 4 examines how group-level interpersonal pressures affect beliefs and open-mindedness in the political realm. This symposium highlights the importance of understanding an individual's social context at the dyadic, group, and network level for sense-making processes.

Self-Regulation

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Every day, individuals face challenges and stressors that require them to regulate their responses to continue forward. When these challenges involve managing intergroup biases or experiences of discrimination, it can radically shape the strategies chosen and resulting outcomes. The current symposium includes four talks providing innovative methods, theories, and findings that explore the perspectives of the perpetrators, witnesses, and targets of intergroup bias. Beatty and Lai will discuss a new framework for understanding how people regulate intergroup biases, calling upon researchers to consider regulation as a broader and dynamic process. Ford et al. will present longitudinal work from two studies examining the long-term consequences of the regulatory choices made after witnessing anti-Black racism. Regarding discrimination, Lohani et al. will present work on how the "adaptiveness" of emotion regulation strategies differs for daily experiences of discrimination, relative to the work on general stressors. In conclusion, Duker et al. will consider the power of finding redemption in one's lived experience, for helping marginalized individuals face experiences of discrimination.

Sexuality

Sexual needs and behaviors can induce a deep sense of connection between partners. Still, sex does not exist in a vacuum. Rather, external influences can spill over into the bedroom, leading to either sexual bliss or conflict. The current symposium aims to unite researchers utilizing diverse methodologies to investigate the situational and relational influences on couple sexual dynamics and the underlying mechanisms at work. The first speaker will delve into the disruptive potential of having power over one's partner, elucidating how it permeates the intimate sphere, triggering desires for alternative partners. Drawing from the longitudinal study "Love in the Time of COVID," the second speaker will demonstrate how COVID-related stressors affected sexual desire, partly through triggering depression. The third speaker will discuss how unpredictability of childhood ecologies adaptively calibrates dyadic sexual desire. The fourth speaker will explore whether having political beliefs similar to one's partner fosters better sex. These studies collectively highlight how couples navigate the complexities of a constantly evolving world to foster stable and fulfilling intimate relationships.

Organizational Behavior

Digital technologies that enable remote work and the use of algorithmic intelligence have transformed the workplace. In this symposium, we investigate the implications of this tech-enabled workplace for women and racial minority workers. The first paper shows that remote work is associated with improvements in racial minority workers' wellbeing and reductions in their perceptions of racial discrimination at work. The second paper takes an intersectional approach to investigating how race and gender impact who speaks up in virtual vs. in-person meetings. The third paper examines how the use of algorithms in hiring changes the perceived merit of women and ethnic minority candidates. The last paper documents gendered attributions for absences in both remote and in-person work, with women's absences more often attributed to personal commitments and men's absences more often attributed to work commitments. Together, these papers shed light on the ways in which novel digital technologies can help and hinder efforts to improve diversity, equity, and inclusion in the workplace.

Person Perception/Impression Formation

Social Cognition

People often make first impressions about others' personality traits based on superficial, minimal information, such as a person's face or social gossip. These initial impressions predict important real-world outcomes across a range of domains, including hiring, relationships, and financial lending. However, because such inferences are based on limited and sometimes superficial (and inaccurate) information, they may not be a reliable assessment of a person's personality. This symposium features four research programs investigating how initial judgments about personality traits (e.g., competence, trustworthiness) that are based on minimal information can be updated. Two talks focus on changing implicit and explicit trait impressions from faces, using counter-stereotype training and diagnostic behavioral evidence. One talk uses computational methods to explore dynamic changes in trait impressions using naturalistic videos and the remaining talk examines ways to change impressions in competence-oriented domains based on limited behavioral information from others. Together, these talks highlight some circumstances in which trait impressions based on minimal information can be revised.

Keith Maddox

Keith Maddox is a professor of psychology & director of the Tufts University Social Cognition (TUSC) Lab. He received his AB (1991) in psychology from the University of Michigan, and his MA (1994) and PhD (1998) in social psychology from the University of California, Santa Barbara. His lab is focused on research programs examining social cognitive aspects of stereotypes of African Americans based on variation in skin tone and other phenotypic characteristics, and ways to encourage and empower individuals to approach intergroup dialogue.

The long-range goal of this work is to further the understanding of the representation and use of stereotypic knowledge and its implications for the behavior and treatment toward members of stereotyped groups. Keith is a fellow of SPSP, SESP, SPSSI, the editor of Social Cognition, and the co-director of the Diversity, Equity, Inclusion, and Justice Leadership MA program at Tufts.

Sarah Gaither

Dr. Sarah Gaither is the Nicolas J. and Theresa M. Leonardy Associate Professor of Psychology and Neuroscience, Bass Society Fellow, and a faculty affiliate for the Samuel DuBois Cook Center on Social Equity, the Center on Health and Society, and Population Research Institute at Duke University. Her research focuses broadly on how a person's social identities and experiences across the lifespan motivate their social perceptions and behaviors in diverse settings. More specifically, she studies how contact with diverse others shapes social interactions, how having multiple racial or multiple social identities affects different types of social behavior, and what contexts shape the development of social perceptions and biases from childhood through adulthood.

Dr. Gaither has become a leader in the field of multiple identity and multiracial research with over 60 publications and is a recipient of APS's Rising Star designation, a Society for Experimental Social Psychology Fellow, an SPSP Sage Young Scholar, and SPSSI Michelle Alexander Early Career Awardee. Her research has been funded by the National Science Foundation, The Ford Foundation, The Russell Sage Foundation, The Charles Lafitte Foundation, and The Spencer Foundation. Dr. Gaither has also garnered media attention including The New York Times, New York Magazine, Time Magazine, People, BBC, and NPR.

Field Research/Interventions

Featured Session

The most pressing issues of our time cannot be solved within the confines of individual laboratories or disciplines. Instead, they require us to work in larger, interdisciplinary teams and to reach out to engage affected communities as active partners in a way not commonly attempted in our field. Fortunately, many of the theories/methods of social/personality psychology are highly adaptable. However, this adaptation and the work more generally must be done in conscious and careful partnership particularly when working with already heavily burdened communities else our work becomes extractive. This panel brings together an interdisciplinary group of scholars and community partners to discuss challenges and opportunities of ethically co-creating knowledge particularly when living and working in overburdened communities. Conversation will use examples from a participatory housing and respiratory health study, abolitionist work with prisoners, and community engaged research among Black pregnant and postpartum persons. There is great need and opportunity for us to have an impact; in this symposium we highlight lessons learned and attempt to motivate your engagement in shared solutions.

What makes a good leader? From being department chair, to chairs of committees, and leaders of professional societies and journals, academics have many opportunities to get involved in leadership roles throughout their career. When and why should you consider taking on these roles? Speakers in this symposium will share their diverse experiences and perspectives serving in leadership roles in the field, and tips for those who may be interested in or are currently in leadership positions. Topics to be discussed include how to decide whether to take on a leadership role; balancing multiple goals and demands on one's time and resources; navigating relationships with others; implementing new practices; and creating a vision. After speakers offer their insights, questions from the audience will be taken in an interactive format. The overarching goal of this session is to openly discuss the important role of leadership in social and personality psychology; to share ideas and experiences of how leadership, at its best, can help to improve departments and the field's morale, productivity, and make the process of leading an enjoyable and rewarding endeavor.

Attitudes/Persuasion

This symposium scrutinizes the implications of the expanding reach of artificial intelligence (AI) and large language models (LLMs) like ChatGPT across social and political domains. Talk 1 unveils AI's potent persuasive ability on divisive policy matters, showcasing GPT-3's influence on individuals' beliefs through three preregistered experiments with diverse samples (N=4,836). Talk 2, through a 3-wave study (N=5,268), shows that people perceive text generated by LLMs as human but ascribe different demographic, personality, and political characteristics to different LLMs. Across three studies (N=1,382), Talk 3 reveals that people from diverse racial backgrounds tend to perceive AI as 'White' and discusses the potential to reinforce existing racial biases and labor market disparities. Lastly, Talk 4 contrasts actual college admission essays with essays written by GPT-4 to show how relying on generative AI can decrease the creativity of groups and humanity over time. Collectively, these talks underscore how human perceptions, attitudes, and behaviors shape and are shaped by AI, while also raising new questions about the ethical, social, and psychological impacts of AI.

Self-Regulation

This symposium will provide evidence that most emotion regulation and coping strategies can be parsimoniously combined into three emotion regulation styles: Integrative regulation (taking interest in emotion, tolerance of affect), dysregulation (rumination, venting, distortion), and emotional avoidance (suppression, denial). We will also show that each emotion regulation style has specific consequences for multiple areas central to social and personality psychology. The present symposium will explore applications of these ER styles in diverse contexts, such as music, intergroup conflict, goal progress, and life adversity. Moreover, we will delve into important theoretical questions revolving around ER styles vs. strategies, autonomous vs. controlled forms of ER strategies, ER strategies at the between vs. within-individual level, the use of concrete tools like music to facilitate ER, and the interplay among ER styles and their associated consequences. Overall, this symposium will provide new evidence for an overarching framework of styles of ER strategies and emphasize the importance of ER across multiple areas of social and personality psychology research.

*Symposia Groups/Intergroup Processes Politics

The modern world is shaped by record interconnectedness and rising levels of social division. Drawing on cutting-edge methods and large cross-country studies (overall $N > 5k$), this symposium will reveal how dialogue across differences can help build connections in our increasingly divided times. The first two talks will cover how a single face-to-face conversation with a political opponent can sizably reduce animosity in both the United States and Germany. The third talk will build on this work to show via NLP and longitudinal analyses that even conversations on hot-button topics (e.g., climate policy) can engender agreement and durably reduce animosity (tested 3 months post-intervention). Moreover, people who signal cognitive flexibility are especially effective in persuading others and reducing animus. The last talk will show how Reddit users with drastically opposing views can build moral consensus in brief text-based interactions. It will also demonstrate how these dyadic exchanges can shape the beliefs of broader networks. Together, these talks will provide a holistic view of how interacting minds can, through dialogue, improve connections and bridge divides.

Communicating with Images: Sociocognitive Functions of Visible and 'Invisible' Imagery

🕒 3:15 PM - 4:25 PM, Feb 9
📍 Room 4, Upper Level

*Symposia Social Cognition Motivation/Goals

Images of events are an integral part of daily life. On cell phones and social media, people capture and share events with photos. In memory and imagination, people think about events with mental images. This symposium integrates how imagery, both visible and 'invisible' (mental imagery), has intra- and interpersonal sociocognitive functions. We showcase ways imagery motivates and communicates information to the self and others, and the role of perspective in imagery's function. The first talk reveals that people use visual perspective in photos (an image as one saw the scene vs. with oneself in the scene) to achieve the goals of capturing the experience or meaning of events. The second talk examines how the presence of a person in an image (vs. only non-human objects) evokes a relational processing style. The third talk shows that the utility of images in online reviews depends on using a reader-centric (vs. writer) perspective that helps readers envision their future experiences. The last talk examines how 1st vs. 3rd person mental imagery perspective facilitates gaining individual-level support or promoting social justice, respectively, when sharing stories about discrimination.

Attitudes/Persuasion

Artificial Intelligence (AI) systems have captured the attention of millions worldwide, unleashing their transformative potential across various fields such as healthcare, therapy, business, and everyday life. However, despite the rapid integration of AI into society, not all AI systems are perceived equally by all people. Some domains witness AI appreciation, where users trust and rely on AI systems as much as trained professionals, while in other domains, AI aversion persists, leading to underutilization and undervaluation of AI capabilities. This symposium aims to shed light on the mechanisms underlying the phenomena of AI appreciation and aversion and explore how manipulating perceptions of AI systems can impact trust. Through four talks, we delve into the complexities surrounding these contrasting attitudes towards AI and offer insights into enhancing AI acceptance and integration.

Morality

Judgment/Decision-Making

Traditional moral psychology relies on top-down approaches using arguably artificial conflicts. This symposium presents four papers that use novel methods to examine morality in real life. Speaker 1 asks the fundamental question of what is virtue? Using Big Data and data-driven methods, findings illuminate fuzzy groupings of virtues as perceived by laypeople. Speaker 2 examines interpersonal moral dilemmas and judgments in real life. Using Reddit data and machine learning, results identify moral dilemmas and judgments that people commonly face, uncovering a moral blind spot that men have against women, which can be reversed. Speaker 3 explores how people who benefit from social preferential treatment resolve competing moral motivations. Using qualitative methods, in-person experiments, and cross-cultural comparisons, results show that a heightened motivation to reciprocate (not a reduced motivation to be inclusive) promotes further exclusion. Speaker 4 focuses on individual differences in moral decision making. Using a multimethod and modeling approach, results show that psychopathic traits predict utilitarian values and highlight different shades of moral decision making.

This symposium examines bias in policing from multiple perspectives (police, community), using multiple methods (experimental, linguistic analysis, quantitative, and qualitative), to understand how police and civilians perceive, communicate about, and respond to biased interactions involving officers and civilians of color. Moving in chronological order of the police-civilian interaction, Saadatian and Lai compare officers' pre-existing racial attitudes to identify factors contributing to disparities in policing outcomes and when biases may emerge. Next, Oxholm and Glaser consider core narrative themes in officers' communication to determine how police make sense of civilian intergroup interactions. Then, Burke examines officers' perceptions of encounters with Black vs. White civilians, and how concerns over appearing racist relate to officers' responses. Last, to understand collective protests about these encounters, Kahn et al. compare public sentiment and racialized language in Twitter posts about BLM protests vs. the Capitol Insurrection. Overall, results inform how the public and police understand, communicate about, and protest against racially relevant police encounters.

Three different studies offer new insights into adjustments that racial and ethnic minorities make in their self-presentational behavior in historically or predominantly White spaces. These studies examine previously understudied contexts in higher education, a broader range of racial/ethnic minorities, and mismatches between perceptions of minority vs. majority group members about adjustments in self-presentation. Moreover, the research featured in this symposium coheres with and extends work showing implications for felt authenticity as an outcome of such adjustments, and as a mediator of other outcomes. These studies cover topics of diversity, equity, and inclusion by investigating how workplace norms of appearance influence Black professionals' perceptions of an organization's favorability; what contextual factors and occupational outcomes are associated with racial code-switching among faculty in higher education; and how minorities define and experience "acting White," compared to how White people perceive this type of racial code-switching. Overall, this symposium aims to advance our knowledge about how individuals calibrate themselves in White-majority contexts.

Social Justice

Politics

Despite a widespread political and legislative movement seeking to restrict and ban education about racism and Critical Race Theory (CRT) throughout the United States, social psychological research on the backlash against anti-racism education has been very limited. In this symposium, four talks lay the foundation for social psychological research on this timely issue. Talk 1 elucidates the connection between investment in White identification and aversion to a core component of CRT, namely a systemic (versus interpersonal) conception of racism. Talk 2 shows that high collective narcissism among White Americans predicts strong opposition to teaching and activism concerning racism. Talk 3 finds that system-justifying beliefs are linked to feelings that CRT is threatening to America and that it should be banned. Talk 4 demonstrates that (a) inaccurate knowledge about CRT predicts opposition to it, and (b) presenting White Americans with accurate CRT information reduces opposition. This symposium highlights the important role social psychology can play in promoting racial justice and democracy in the context of education.

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Cultural biases (e.g., gender bias) can hide in plain sight. Using various tools and methodologies to analyze large-scale, real-world data, four talks demonstrate the power of social psychological research to uncover and understand these biases “in the wild.” The first talk involves the bibliometric analysis of a large sample of articles published in top journals, showing a gender bias in special issues likely due to ingroup bias among male editors. The second talk examines gender bias in the grammar of a large corpus of children’s TV shows, revealing that male (vs. female) concepts are more often the syntactic agent (vs. patient) of a sentence and are more often connected with semantic content denoting agency. The third talk investigates androcentric bias (a tendency to equate “people” with “men”) in 39 languages, showing that less gendered languages can ironically allow androcentric bias to go unchecked, making women invisible. The fourth talk uncovers a cultural bias in large language models, which scientists increasingly use to analyze real-world data, illustrating how these models produce responses that resemble WEIRD participants and offering potential solutions.

Inside the Grant Panel: A Small Grant Competition

🕒 3:15 PM - 4:25 PM, Feb 9

📍 Ballroom 6D, Upper Level

Featured Ses...

Inside the Grant Panel will be presented in person during SPSP's Annual Convention and live-streamed as well.

Panelists are: Ximena Arriaga, Elizabeth Seto, and Benjamin Karney

Inside the Grant Panel is a small grant competition that provides members with a behind-the-scenes view of how the grant review process works. Members are encouraged to submit an application to fund a relatively inexpensive, well-powered study that may be submitted for publication and for presentation at a future SPSP convention. From the application pool, three finalists will be selected. The three finalists must be members of SPSP for 2024 and register to attend the annual convention in person.

During the Inside the Grant Panel session at the Annual Convention experienced SPSP member reviewers discuss the merits and weaknesses of the three finalists and score them to determine a winner and two runners-up.

The winner will receive a $3,000 grant for their research and the runners-up will receive $1,000 research grants. Inside the Grant Panel is intended to be an educational experience for both applicants and audience members and is open to any current SPSP member who has not previously received an SPSP Small Research Grant or been selected as a winner or runner-up of the Inside the Grant Panel competition.

Awards may be used to compensate participants (online or in-person), purchase supplies, travel to research sites, or pay research assistants. Funds may not be used for salary or travel to conferences, and no indirect costs will be granted to the awardee's institution. If the grantee's institution cannot receive grants without direct costs being assumed, payments and tax-reporting responsibility fall upon the grantee.

Disrupting the Editorial Processes to be more Inclusive: The PSPR Model

🕒 4:30 PM - 5:30 PM, Feb 9

📍 Room 11B, Upper Level

In January 2023, the Society for Personality and Social Psychology (SPSP) and the Personality and Social Psychology Review (PSPR) appointed me, Stephen Baffour Adjei, as the inaugural Editorial Fellow. The overarching goal of the Editorial Fellowship was to create a supportive pathway to editorial leadership for psychologists from communities that have been historically excluded from these roles. In this talk, I highlight my experiences as an inaugural Editorial Fellow for the past one year by focusing on my learnings and lessons from the Fellowship, and how I plan to share the learnings with my social and professional networks in Ghana, Africa, and other Majority World settings. I will share my insights on what SPSP needs to learn and do to dismantle systemic barriers to full and equitable participation in the social and personality psychological discourse, and to amplify the voices of scholars in Africa and other Majority World contexts to achieve inclusive excellence.

SPSP at the UN: Launch Event & Inaugural Info Session

🕒 5:00 PM - 6:00 PM, Feb 9

📍 Room 9, Upper Level

This event marks the formal kick-off of SPSP's presence at the United Nation. In a mix of celebration and infom-session, we will introduce the SPSP membership to the new program and the many opportunities that come with it. As such, we will first provide a quick review of the UN's mission and structure, before describing SPSP's newly acquired consultative status at the UN. We will then showcase ongoing and future opportunities for SPSP members to engage with the UN, including ways to share their research with globally relevant societal stakeholders, policy makers, and diplomats at in-person and online events. We will conclude by charting out next steps, inviting members to join the party, and raising a toast to SPSP's bright future at the UN.

Want to meet other social-personality psychologists doing intersectionality research? Join the newest Community Catalyst Grant community, the Intersectionality Working Group. By creating a community focused on intersectionality research, we believe that community members will be better equipped to address relevant topics in the field such as the self, stereotyping, prejudice, and discrimination, as well as incorporate critical theories and methods. Additionally, we recognize that there is no formal community within SPSP focused on the discussion of intersectionality across existing SPSP communities, or the implications that it has for social-personality psychology. Our welcome reception will bring together like-minded scholars to sustain collaborations within social-personality psychology, advance conversations related to intersectionality, and provide important networking opportunities.

Navigating Identity Disclosure in Academia

*Professional Develop...

Many SPSP members have hidden or inconspicuous marginalized social identities. In 2021, 0.83% of SPSP members identified as transgender, 9.29% of members identified as bisexual, 6.06% identified as gay/lesbian, and 5.28% reported having a disability. Of note, these percentages reflect members who are willing to disclose their social identity. Nearly 2% of SPSP members preferred not to disclose their gender identity, 2.42% preferred not to disclose whether they were transgender, 12.42% preferred not to disclose their gender identity, and 7.29% preferred not to disclose their disability status. Current trends in academia indicate that many individuals with hidden marginalized social identities lack ingroup mentors to help them navigate holding those identities in academia (Sanchez et al., 2015).

In this professional development session, five panelists who have one or more hidden social identities (Bipolar disorder, transgender, gay/lesbian, pansexual, neuroatypical, dyslexic, concealable physical disability, first gen) will speak to their experiences navigating identity disclosure in academia followed by a Q&A session. Example experiences include how, when, and why disclosure took place, coping with choices to disclose or not disclose, looking at one's identity as a strength rather than a weakness, and the effects of disclosure in collaborations and the formal academic system.

Acquiring funding can be a daunting task, particularly for international scholars and PhD students who are ineligible for significant grants and fellowships. Participants in this workshop will learn how to discover funding opportunities that align with their background and research interests, as well as how to craft competitive applications for grants, awards, and scholarships. The workshop aims to cultivate resilience in the face of inevitable rejection during the funding application process. While the workshop will include some lecture material, the primary emphasis will be on skill-building. The speaker will collaborate with the audience to identify their research interests and funding requirements, using participants' examples to demonstrate effective strategies for finding relevant funding and composing successful applications. This workshop will appeal to all scholars seeking funding for their research and seeking to enhance their CV through awards and scholarships, with a particular emphasis on international scholars and PhD students who are ineligible for major funding sources in the US.

Advances in Cultural Psychology beyond the West

🕒 8:00 AM - 9:10 AM, Feb 10

📍 Room 2, Upper Level

*Symposia

Culture

Norms and Social Influence

Cultural psychology seeks to understand how different cultures shape and reflect their members' psychological processes. Yet, by and large (cultural) psychology continues to be a science of the Western world and the global North – despite powerful and well-cited calls to action and widespread awareness of the issues that come with this. But all is not lost. In this symposium, we highlight recent advances in cultural psychology beyond the West by showcasing four innovative research programs from four understudied world regions. Individually, our four presentations illuminate cultural dynamics in Sub-Saharan Africa, causes and consequences of regional variation in cultural tightness across India, the unique cultural constitution of Mediterranean countries which defy the cultural East-West dichotomy, and the nuances of individualism-collectivism in East Asian countries. Collectively, they underscore the need for – and promise of – a truly diverse psychology and chart out a path toward a more complete understanding of culture and those who live in them.

Gender

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Prejudice against transgender and nonbinary individuals is pervasive but remains poorly understood. In this symposium, four talks examine different forms of prejudice against these groups and the cognitive mechanisms that give rise to them using classical experiments and diverse and novel methods. The first talk examines how perceived group properties (e.g., within-group similarity) shape negative attitudes toward people who belong to transgender and nonbinary groups. The second talk focuses on understanding how cognitive biases relate to cross-racial transgender stereotypes and misgendering, which are linked with negative outcomes such as dehumanization and increased social distance. The third talk examines animalization and disgust as antecedents of aggression towards gender conforming or non-conforming transgender people. Lastly, the fourth talk investigates whether embodying a transgender avatar in virtual reality can help improve attitudes and behavior toward transgender people. Taken together, the research presented in the four talks advances current understanding of prejudice towards transgender and nonbinary people and interventions to reduce it.

Intergroup Relations

Social Justice

If racially minoritized groups form intraminority coalitions, they have the potential to challenge the racial hierarchy. At the same time, differences in group status, discrimination experiences, and interests may pose barriers to coalition formation. Higher status minority groups may be unmotivated to form coalitions if they perceive low levels of discrimination, while lower status minority groups may then question the loyalty of these higher status groups. Our symposium examines how such factors shape coalitional attitudes. Talk 1 tests how discrimination experiences shape multiracial people's ingroup perception of shared minority groups. Talk 2 shows Asian endorsement of BLM increases after sharing discrimination experiences with a Black person. From the viewpoint of relatively lower status groups, Black people's perceptions of Black-White multiracials' group commitments are important for their trust of multiracials to advocate for Black rights (Talk 3), and underestimating White-passing Asian-White multiracials' commitment to Asians leads Asian people to reject this group (Talk 4). These talks underscore important facilitators and barriers of intraminority coalition formation.

Person Perception/Impression Formation

Judgment/Decision-Making

This symposium, consisting of four talks, presents cutting-edge research on biases in conversational dynamics and their impact on social perceptions and conflict resolution. The first talk employs natural language processing to reveal that people fail to detect cues of their partner's topic preferences, unveiling a persistent cognitive barrier to fluent communication. The second talk distinguishes between two types of "liking gaps" describing people's overly pessimistic beliefs about how much others like them after conversations, and explores links with personality traits and social experiences. The third talk on dissimilarity pessimism explores biases in beliefs about dissimilar others' interest in talking, providing new perspectives on homophily and intergroup interactions. Finally, the fourth talk investigates people's expressiveness of their willingness to learn during conflict and unveils two successful interventions that help with this skill. Together, these talks advance our understanding of biases that color our conversational dynamics, with important implications for impression formation, close relationship maintenance, intergroup relations, and conflict management.

Evolution

Close Relationships

Many features of human cognition are adapted to regulating the formation and maintenance of mutually beneficial relationships. In this symposium, we use the lens of evolutionary psychology to develop and extend our understanding of how people initiate and maintain cooperative relationships. Our speakers will examine the function(s) of feeling and expressing gratitude after an exchange of benefits from the perspective of both the beneficiary and benefactor; how perceived relationship value and risk exploitation mediate effects of transgressor conciliatory or antagonistic gestures in forgiveness decisions; and our final speaker will present a study that demonstrates the moderating effect physical distance has on helping with gifts and loans across 21 Tanzanian villages, demonstrating the importance of long-distance friendships as a robust strategy for managing risk and resource access. Throughout, we will illustrate approaches used in evolutionary psychology by identifying universal psychological mechanisms using diverse study designs, drawing evidence from multiple research domains, and sampling from diverse populations, including communities resembling ancient human societies.

Narratives provide people with flexible, generative ways to navigate and negotiate aspects of their identity, especially those aspects that are non-modal and marginalized. The four talks in this symposium explore how the generation, perception, consumption, and sharing of narratives contribute to well-being, and an evolving self-concept, with a particular focus on narrative use in members of groups whose life experiences are stigmatized and challenging. Using varied research approaches (e.g., experimental, longitudinal, interview, and social cognition) to collect both quantitative and qualitative empirical data, these lines of research bring to light new ways that people relate to narratives, showing that perceptions of agency, social connections, and self-evaluation are important correlates of both self-generated narratives and narratives presented to participants as interventions. The work presented demonstrates a range of applications for narrative research to individual and community well-being, as well as novel insights that narrative-based approaches can bring to social-personality psychology.

The Psychological Science Accelerator (PSA) is a globally distributed network of researchers (≈ 2500 members) who pool intellectual and material resources to conduct big-team science. This symposium reviews three recent PSA-related initiatives. First, Paul Eastwick will reveal the findings of the Preference-Matching Project: a Registered Report that comprehensively tests how strongly (and under what circumstances) ideal-partner preference-matching predicts romantic outcomes among 10,000 participants from 40 countries. Second, Nikki Legate will present findings from one of the three PSA COVID-19 Rapid projects, an experiment examining the effects of autonomy-promoting COVID-19 health messages among 25,718 participants from 89 countries. Third, Nicholas Coles will discuss an affiliated project called the Many Smiles Collaboration: an adversarial collaboration that designed and ran foundational tests of the facial feedback hypothesis with 3,878 participants spanning 19 countries. These efforts illustrate how the PSA—and big-team science in general—can accelerate the accumulation of reliable and generalizable evidence across different psychological topics and theoretical traditions.

Prosocial Behavior

Allyship is a necessary component of successful cross-cultural friendships as well as organizational DEI policy and practices. However, many potential “allies” (i.e., anyone holding an advantaged group member identity) do not know how to be a ‘good’ ally. In short, allyship is hard. This symposium identifies and discusses how advantaged group members (AGMs) think about their privileged identities, and how such awareness impacts their support of disadvantaged group members (DGMs) or policies that support them (Projects 1 and 2). Additionally, one project studies the efficacy of a personal intervention aimed at calming one’s threat arousal, which is often heightened by the mere opportunity of addressing or confronting prejudice in social situations (Project 3). Lastly, Project 4 consults DGMs on how they perceive allyship behaviors undertaken by AGMs, such as addressing prejudice on the behalf of DGMs. The evidence from this project revealed that AGMs should not necessarily be discouraged from engaging in allyship, but rather be cognizant of how and when they approach said situations and how their approach might impact those who they intend to help.

Mexicans and Mexican Americans make up the majority of the Latinx population in the U.S at 36.1 million people. Still, this demographic group has been widely understudied in psychology. Thus, our psychological theories often neglect to consider the impact of Mexican cultural norms and values in modern society. We highlight current research conducted in this population by uniting scholars who describe current findings related to identity and cultural values in Mexican people. Paper 1 discusses the culture of honor in Mexico that impacts secret-keeping behavior. Paper 2 finds that Mexican Americans perceive "Latinx" as a term mainly used by non-Hispanic Whites. Paper 3 finds that for both US Latinos and Mexicans, feelings of familial obligation lead to internal attributions of others. Lastly, paper 4 shows that first-generation Mexican students favor implicit harmony-maintaining modes of conflict resolution, which led to less satisfying roommate relations. Together, these findings highlight cultural differences for the two largest racial ethnic groups in the U.S. In doing so, we expand beyond WEIRD populations by capturing culture-specific psychological phenomena.

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Social Cognition

Often seen as the “model minority,” Asian people remain one of the most misunderstood and understudied social groups. Psychological theories about what they are like, why they are perceived the way they are, and how they experience the “bamboo ceiling” are still underdeveloped. Here, we present cutting-edge research advancing the understanding of Asians in the US. Talk 1 uncovers the diversity within the broad Asian umbrella by highlighting the often-overlooked distinctions between East and South Asians’ psychological profiles. Talk 2 reveals that East Asians are under-selected for leadership positions partially because they are stereotyped as lacking creativity, a prized leadership attribute in US culture. Talks 3 and 4 report converging findings from independent research teams: East Asians’ experience of prejudice often occur on the dimension of mechanical dehumanization, introducing an integrative framework that explains isolated past findings on prejudice against East Asian people. Featuring a wide range of methodologies and data sources, these talks provide novel insights into the overlooked experiences of and distinctions within the Asian population.

Research highlights the lack of global diversity in the psychological database and the need to better reflect experiences and perspectives of under-represented populations. Likewise, research needs to be better contextualized to evaluate generalizability. Adequately tackling these global research concerns requires corresponding changes in how social and personality psychology is taught at undergraduate and graduate levels. In training the next generation of psychologists, it is critical to highlight work that is conducted in under-represented regions, and to consider the extent to which classic and contemporary findings generalize globally. For instructors in North America and Western Europe, this may start with presenting research conducted in non-Western societies, while for instructors from other regions it may mean incorporating local research that critically compares and contrasts international textbook findings and local realities. The session highlights challenges and opportunities associated with integrating global research in psychology programs, sharing suggestions for how to locate and integrate global perspectives into course planning, mentorship, and research.

Professional Develop...

Latines* are among the largest minority groups in the US, and now is the perfect time to identify issues facing Latine in the academy and form a network of scholars to address these issues. In the first half of this interactive panel we will have Latine scholars discuss their experiences in the academy. Panelists include graduate students, postdoctoral fellows, and professors at various ranks and institutions. The second half of the panel will invite attendees to form small groups, get to know one another, and establish network connections. The goals of this professional panel is focused on increasing networking and collaboration among Latine scholars and facilitating belonging in SPSP by sharing experiences from Latine scholars. The upcoming SPSP conference is the ideal time to host this professional development session. The conference will be held in San Diego - a city that borders Mexico and where 30.1% of its residents identify as Latine (Census, 2023). We expect many local university students and faculty to attend this conference, and believe this topic will be particularly well-attended. All individuals interested in issues facing Latines are invited to join.

Tips and Tricks from Efficient and Productive Researchers II

🕒 9:30 AM - 12:10 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 11A, Upper Level

Professional Develop...

A panel of productive researchers shares tips and tricks to work efficiently. Panelist 1 (P1) discusses tips for maximizing two limited resources, time and funding, as an early career scholar. P2 shares tips on efficiently streamlining scholarship by establishing and leveraging a unique research identity. P3 touches on navigating work-life balance in academic environments traditionally not meant for marginalized identities. P4 shares experiences on maintaining research productivity in various life stages that require juggling multiple responsibilities. P5 discusses the strategies for creating simple and flexible project development, writing strategies, and goal setting. P6 focuses on the power of playing to personal strengths and finding collaborators who offset one's weaknesses. Finally, P7 provides insights into cross-disciplinary collaborations and leveraging computational resources for social-personality psychology without the necessity for new data collection. This fast-paced and engaging session will offer a wealth of insights for both new and experienced researchers navigating academic productivity.

Diverse Voices for (in)Equality: Theoretical Advances in Advocacy and Solidarity

*Symposia

Diversity

Intergroup Relations

When and how do diverse coalitions effectively undermine or promote intergroup equality? This symposium provides a comprehensive view of this issue by integrating diverse methods and perspectives, including theories of critical consciousness, social dominance, and persuasion. Talk 1 applies qualitative methods and the developmental theory of critical consciousness to explore what facilitates and hinders solidarity among youth facing different dimensions of marginalization. Talk 2 shows how social dominance orientation drives some White Americans to weaponize diversity rhetoric to justify racial inequities in schools and the workplace. Talk 3 draws from persuasion theory and research on perceptions of activism to test how conservative activists' race shapes perceptions of their expertise and vested interest when advocating against progressive causes. Talk 4 examines whether and when advocates' expressions of two-sided messages are effective in reducing perceptions of advocates' bias. Identifying theory-driven mechanisms that underlie (and may undermine) diverse coalitions is vital for understanding psychological dynamics that hinder and promote efforts to reduce inequality.

Gender inequality in work and family domains: A seven-headed dragon

Gender

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Even though women's participation in the workforce and men's participation in (child)care has increased considerably, gender equality in work and family domains is far from complete. Reducing the impact of gender on people's work and family lives is like fighting a 7-headed dragon: cutting off one head results in new heads to appear. In this symposium we present four mechanisms that keep gender inequality in W-F domains firmly in its place. The first presentation zooms in on the work/family interface and reveals how gender stereotypes internalized by working parents trigger stronger parental guilt in mothers than fathers. The second presentation reveals how gender inequality at work is maintained through men's tendency to select women who legitimize rather than challenge gender inequality (a.k.a. 'queen bees'), especially when they fear status loss. The third presentation discusses the important ways in which gender expectations restrict even relatively gender-egalitarian men in their life choices roles. The final presentation uncovers social penalties and relationship strain in heterosexual relationships where the female partner has surpassed her male partner in societal status.

Motivation/Goals

Self-Regulation

Navigating conflicts arising from competing objectives and desires is crucial for successful goal pursuit. However, existing psychological theories and interventions on goal conflict remain fragmented and limited. This symposium brings together cutting-edge research to push the boundaries of goal conflict resolution. Talk #1 provides an integrative framework to theorize and measure the strategies people use to manage conflicting goals and shows their implications. Talk #2 adds a complementary view, unpacking the antecedents and consequences of perceiving one's personal goals as coherent. Talk #3 introduces the issue of time, comparing the experience and resolution of different conflicts between immediate desires and long-term goals in everyday life. Lastly, Talk #4 progresses to an institutional level and presents precommitment strategies organizations can employ to facilitate individuals' long-term goals. Collectively, these talks offer a multi-dimensional view of goal dynamics, spanning from conflicts to coherence, and individual strategies to organizational interventions, providing valuable insights into effective goal conflict management across diverse domains.

Novel Methods and Applications for Measuring Cultural Distance Between Groups

Culture

Methods/Statistics

Research examining cultural variation often tests only a few groups or traits at one time. This symposium showcases empirical applications for a novel measure of cultural differences: the cultural fixation index, which quantifies the size of cultural differences between groups across a wide array of cultural values, beliefs, and behaviors, across 90+ countries. The first talk maps cultural distances between WEIRD and non-WEIRD countries and finds variability within non-WEIRD cultures that is currently underexplored in psychology. The second talk applies cultural distance to measure the speed of cultural change within countries and tests several factors affecting rate of change. The third talk shows that cultural distance between international students' heritage and host cultures impacts first-year students' social networks. The final talk tests whether larger cultural distances between groups within a country predicts negative social outcomes. Together, this symposium highlights how this new level of analysis, cultural distance, can expand our understanding of the psychology of non-WEIRD cultures, cultural change, social networks and sources of conflict within countries.

Norms and Social Influence

Social Justice

Across many domains, individuals significantly and systematically misperceive social norms and policy support among their peers. While there is extensive work showing the impacts of perceived social norms on behaviors, and a growing body of evidence documenting social misperceptions around important policy issues, there is less work examining the underlying mechanisms that lead to widespread social misperceptions. In this symposium, we address this gap by bringing together research that begins to identify psychological and behavioral predictors of social (mis)perceptions across several domains, including climate change, vaccination, gun control, rights of LGBTIQ+ people, and diversity, equity, and inclusion. Using a mix of nationally representative cross-sectional surveys and natural experiments, our studies find that media exposure, social network dynamics, institutional and policy signals, and social motivations are predictive of these misperceptions. The authors discuss implications for solutions to correct social misperceptions.

Intergroup Relations

Religious identity has been paradoxically heralded as both the solution to and cause of intergroup bias/conflict. This symposium brings together novel research exploring how religious identification contributes to bias and conflict as well as intergroup cooperation in the domains of sexual prejudice, racial attitudes, and interreligious bias in the US and beyond. The first talk examines the role of religious and political identification in bias towards LGBT individuals revealing that identity threat may exacerbate political polarization. The second talk reveals that Christian's perceptions of rising LGBT demographics motivate zero-sum beliefs, moral opposition to same-sex marriage, social distancing from LGBT individuals and Christian radicalization. The third talk reveals that images of Black deities increase ideologies that maintain racism in the US (i.e. colorblind ideology; social dominance orientation). The final talk demonstrates that focusing on God's wishes increases intergroup cooperation among Fijian Christians and Hindus even in the face of outgroup threat. Together these talks inform how religion shapes ingroup attitudes in multiple domains.

*Symposia

Judgment/Decision-Making

Field Research/Interventions

How does humanizing the agents involved in inequality reduction affect resource allocation? Using evidence from online and field settings, four talks demonstrate potential benefits and drawbacks of this approach on individual decision making, interpersonal attitudes, and policy preferences. The first session shows that giver spotlighting - in which the identity of givers is made salient to receivers - reduces receivers' willingness to accept the aid and recommend it to others. The second session challenges the assumption that choice in donation opportunities increases prosocial spending, because presenting a choice over who to help (vs. what to give) reduces donation behavior for potential givers. In contrast, the third session demonstrates that humanizing workers of low-wage jobs increases empathy and support for better labor conditions, and the fourth session finds that personal stories about how aid can increase recipients' agency improve intergroup attitudes and support for universal basic income policy. By examining the psychological effects of humanizing resource givers and receivers, this symposium presents theoretical and practical insights for addressing inequality.

Individual Differences

Psychological studies often rely on carefully controlled lab experiments to understand people's behavior, affect, cognition, and/or responses to different types of situations. However, the new adoption of mobile sensing methods presents opportunities for ecological approaches to core questions in social and personality psychology, including: To what extent do person and situation factors explain real-world behavior? How can situations be assessed in daily life settings? Can individual differences be predicted from digital records? In this symposium, we present insights from mobile sensing projects that investigate such questions. Speaker 1 presents on the Big Five personality traits and everyday contexts that explain smartphone behavior. Speaker 2 presents on the use of mobile sensing data for predicting psychological situations. Speaker 3 presents on a predictive investigation of individual differences in the behavioral manifestation of cognitive abilities. Speaker 4 presents on the use of speech data from audio recordings for predicting momentary affect. Overall, the symposium will illustrate the promise of mobile sensing methods for research in social and personality psychology.

Gender

Morality

Following the tragic death of Mahsa Amini at the hands of the Islamic Republic's Morality Police, the "Women, Life, Freedom" movement has emerged as a formidable force for gender equality and social justice. This movement represents just one front in the ongoing global fight against violence and discrimination faced by women, presenting complex political and moral challenges. This symposium brings together four lines of inquiry that delve into this pressing issue from different angles. Analyzing 700 million tweets in Persian, the first talk explores the relative persuasiveness of anecdotal and generalized frames in shaping the "Women, Life, Freedom" discourse. The second talk focuses on attitudes toward violence against women in Turkey (N = 241); examining scenarios depicting conflict between spouses, the researchers link honor endorsement with participants' degree of hostile sexism. Using a representative sample of women in India (N = 128,947), the third talk associates sexist beliefs with tolerance of violence against women in India, showing that even seemingly protective beliefs about women can reproduce inequality and violence. Lastly, through two experiments using American participants (N = 360), the fourth talk explores how race and gender are constructed based on their distance from socially valued exemplars.

Peer review has consequences for both the quality of science and the scientific workforce, including what research is published and cited, as well as who wants to and is able to advance in research-focused careers. However, recent data and high-profile incidents (e.g., Aly et al., 2023; Roberts, 2022) highlight the urgency of addressing systemic racism and marginalization in the peer-review process. To raise awareness and invite action-oriented discussion toward improving peer review, SPSP's Early Career Committee has partnered with Reviewer Zero (www.reviewerzero.net) to organize what we call the "Hidden Stories" moderated panel discussion series. The first panel, which occurred during SPSP's 2023 convention, was well-attended and received positive feedback. In 2024, we seek to deepen and expand the conversation by bringing together new panelists whose experiences are grounded in identities, regions, and contexts notably missing from the 2023 discussion (e.g., Global South, LGBTQ+). This diverse panel of scholars will also discuss suggestions and actionable steps that our field can take to promote more equitable psychological science and an inclusive community of scientists.

Grant-seeking from Private Foundations: What Investigators Should Know

🕒 11:00 AM - 12:10 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 11B, Upper Level

Professional Develop...

Seeking external funding for social science research is a competitive process and preparing a successful grant application can be challenging and time-consuming. In addition to government sources of research funding, private foundations can be an important source of financial support for scholarly research. This session will provide grant writing tips and insights into the application and review process from both the grant-making and grant-seeking side. The panel includes two prominent private funders of social, educational, behavioral, economic, and policy-relevant research—the Russell Sage Foundation and the Spencer Foundation—and two of their grantees. With extensive funding experience and evaluating proposals as part of the grant-making process, program staff from each foundation will discuss their grant application and review process, and the basics of what makes a good grant proposal. Grants recipients will discuss and provide insights about the application process from the grant-seeking side as well as their experience reviewing proposals for foundations. This session is intended to provide valuable information to all scholars, from students to late career researchers.

Social Development

The rapid diffusion of online misinformation poses extensive societal consequences, necessitating urgent action. This symposium unites scientists dedicated to combating misinformation, providing a platform to share insights, methodologies, and findings. With a focus on online social media, the symposium encompasses four distinct perspectives: First, shedding light on partisan disagreements in content removal. Second, examining the impact of targeting audiences' values on misinformation sharing. Third, proposing an early warning detection system using text analysis and psycho-linguistic characteristics, and fourth, investigating how well fact-checking works in the face of emotional claims. Through interdisciplinary collaboration across psychology, communication, and computer science, the symposium fosters comprehensive exploration of misinformation sharing. By fostering unique insights and fruitful discussions, this symposium facilitates solutions to combat the rapid spread of online misinformation in our digital era. Finally, we aim to advance the status of academic research as well as propose actionable insights to make today's social media a better place.

Trust is a crucial construct in our lives; it allows us to process information fluently, build meaningful relationships, communicate easily and be an active part in society. The symposium offers innovations in the study of trust, both methodologically and theoretically. First, we will present a study proposing a new method for measuring people's initial inclination towards trust or distrust, demonstrating that trust is the dominant response. The second talk will present studies in the context of public goods games, demonstrating that expressing trust enables continued compliance even without sanctions, suggesting a self-fulfilling prophecy effect regarding trust-related behavior. The third talk will demonstrate how the reaction to real life situations of learned helplessness (succumbing versus resilience) affects interpersonal trust. Finally, we will provide evidence that exposure to attitude inconsistent information undermines trust, leading to incongruent responses. However, through empathy, it is possible to restore trust even in this situation. Collectively, the studies offer insights into both social and personality antecedents of trust.

Field Research/Interventions

Diversity

Research in the past two decades demonstrates the potential of social-psychological interventions to tackle pressing societal issues like disparities in academic achievement, strained police-community relationships, and group-based prejudices. Most of this work has focused on changing individuals themselves; for example, providing tools to help them cope in less inclusive environments. But a growing body of research explores the impact of altering the context. Changing the context places the onus of change on unfair systems rather than the individuals within them. However, this approach is challenging because it often requires those in power (e.g., teachers, police officers) to make meaningful changes to their practice. This symposium explores the promises and challenges of the shift to a context-focused era in intervention research. Four researchers will present groundbreaking studies that modify contextual features to address societal problems. This work complements social-psychological interventions that target individuals while highlighting the potential for context-focused interventions to create widespread change to a status quo that advantages dominant group members.

Four Ways Culture Shapes What Makes Us Happy

🕒 11:00 AM - 12:10 PM, Feb 10

*Symposia Culture Mental Health/Well-Being

Four studies show how the ingredients for happiness depend on culture. Talk 1 explores how people in 19 cultures coped with the pandemic. Strategies like rumination and suppression have long thought to be harmful, but they were benign—even helpful—in collectivist cultures like Bangladesh.

Talk 2 explores emotions in daily diaries across cultures. The diaries revealed richer distinctions for socially engaging emotions in Korea and for disengaging emotions in the US. People were happier over time if their emotional experiences fit their culture.

Talk 3 asks why wealthy East Asia is less happy than Western cultures. In China, interdependent rice-farming regions were less happy than independent wheat-farming regions, replicating larger East-West differences. People in rice regions compared social status markers like income more, and this was linked to unhappiness.

Talk 4 tests causality more directly by tracking social interactions and happiness longitudinally. People in rice areas sought out more interactions with people of higher status, yet these interactions made them less happy over time. Taken together, these studies illustrate how culture shapes our wellbeing.

Diversity

Organizational DEI initiatives can unintentionally harm the very individuals they intend to include. We explore how different DEI practices affect marginalized group members (LGBTQ+ individuals, people of color, women), shedding light on how DEI practices can be more or less effective in promoting equity. Talk 1 shows that when they are merely the norm, corporate pride month messages lower LGBTQ+ peoples' belonging, identity disclosure, and job interest. Talk 2 finds that Lean In messages harm women by reinforcing masculine norms, increasing agentic expectations, and reducing interest in corporate employment. Talk 3 shows that Black prospective graduate students see departments as dishonest when they only have diversity statements but no action-based cues (e.g., racially diverse faculty), but as inclusive and places they want to apply to when they have both. Finally, Talk 4 shows that "diversity blind spots"—inflated organizational diversity perceptions—can undermine White and Latinx' peoples diversity initiative support in the first place. Researchers and practitioners should take identity-centered approaches to identify interventions that truly foster equity in diverse contexts.

The recent rise of large language models (LLMs) such as GPT raises burning questions about how LLMs will shape the future of social psychology. This symposium presents new findings highlighting the promises and pitfalls of using LLMs in psychology research. The first talk shows that LLMs' ability to detect psychological constructs from text surpasses the performance of popular methods and provides unprecedented opportunities to expand research to non-English-speaking cultures. The second and third talks assess the potential of using LLMs to simulate survey participants. Examining a domain believed to be uniquely human—morality, the second talk shows that LLMs remarkably estimate human moral judgment with a striking correlation of .95. The third talk warns that LLMs significantly exaggerate partisan and racial divisions, estimating polarization levels to be 7 times greater than reality. The final talk, analyzing 55 psychology experiments, finds that LLMs can effectively estimate experimental treatment effects, and examines variations in performance across demographic groups. The symposium will conclude by discussing whether and how LLMs can be used to improve psychology research.

Morality

Self/Identity

Moral psychology often focuses on judgments and decisions regarding other people; here, we explore how our sense of self shapes moral cognition, through the themes of the self as victim, complex identities of the self, reputational costs to the self, and obligations to the self. Talk 1 uses experimental and naturalistic data to explore how the self as a victim of moral transgressions affects responses to close vs. distant others who commit those transgressions. Talk 2 investigates how complex self identities can reduce ingroup bias in moral cognition: seeing oneself as having multifaceted social identities reduces feeling threatened by ingroup members' transgressions. Talk 3 demonstrates that people overestimate reputational costs to the self of performing necessary evils, and how a more accurate view of these costs can facilitate moral action. Talk 4 explores people's conceptions of duties to the self, demonstrating that people conceive of this as a highly moralized category distinct from social expectations, preferences/goals, and not dependent on obligations to others. Together, the talks offer new perspectives on the central role of the self in our sense of morality.

Personality Processes/Traits

Norms and Social Influence

Constellation

Personality expression varies in individuals from day to day, but little research has explored the underlying reasons and consequences of this variability. Here, we present a novel perspective on personality as a dynamic system in which individuals actively regulate their personality in response to situational demands. First, we will situate personality within a continuous-time modeling framework to investigate how personality expressions change in relation to various perceptions of social situations. Second, we will examine interindividual differences in the regulatory ability of personality change. Third, we will introduce the adaptive personality regulation index—the ability to express personality to meet situational requirements—and distinguish it from related constructs. Finally, we will explore the role of personality change within the context of well-being interventions, examining how an alignment between personality and a specific well-being activity can positively influence outcomes. This symposium challenges the notion that personality variations are arbitrary and instead highlights the adaptive nature of personality, demonstrating that it can be flexibly modified in response to situational demands.

Psychological research on climate change has progressed from understanding climate skepticism to now focusing on solutions. This symposium examines social psychological factors that shape climate change solutions, specifically examining political division, social identity and norms, perception of sustainable technology, and the relationship to the natural environment. The first speaker will explore the interaction among four key agents - the populace, politicians, media, and activists - in perpetuating and reflecting the conflict surrounding climate change. Each group is influenced by factors such as identity, norms, social context, and urgency. The second speaker will consider how political polarization affects the effectiveness of interventions across 60 countries. The third speaker will discuss meta-analytic insights for the most successful interventions within the United States. The final speaker will evaluate how individual differences like comfortability tampering with nature affects public support for technologies of climate adaptation and mitigation. Together, these talks explore the psychological dimensions of climate change and pathways forward for behavioral solutions.

Social Justice

Groups/Intergroup Processes

Few issues highlight societal injustice like the violence against unarmed members of disadvantaged groups that has sparked protest movements like Black Lives Matter (BLM). But, in polarized societies like the U.S., these issues are contentious and can have diverse impact. Thus, speakers explore the impact of BLM psychologically, socially, and societally. They explore a range of psychological constructs (e.g., meaning in life, implicit bias, protest support) with diverse samples and methods -- including experimental exposure to images, mass IAT data, and millions of public tweets. Our first speaker presents evidence of how both BLM and its counter movement impacts people existentially. Our second speaker discusses how both racial and disability implicit bias changed with the emergence of BLM (2013-2020) and COVID-19 in 2020. Our third speaker presents social psychological prerequisites of White American's 2020 support of BLM. Our fourth speaker shows how the topic discussed on social media shaped sentiment at the police killing of Mike Brown in 2014. These talks raise key questions for the psychological, social, societal, and scientific impact of social justice movements like BLM.

The average adult spends approximately 30% of their waking hours alone. But how does this time alone influence our health and wellbeing? Religious leaders like the Buddha have harnessed time alone as a path to inner peace and self-knowledge. Others, including the U.S. Surgeon General, warn of a social isolation epidemic caused by spending too much time alone. Indeed, time alone is a multi-faceted experience that can lead to both positive (e.g., relaxation) and negative (e.g., loneliness) outcomes. As such, many questions remain regarding when, why, for whom, and under what conditions time alone benefits or undermines health and wellbeing. To address these questions, this symposium gathers a diverse array of researchers who are conducting rigorous, multi-method, and multi-level research on time alone. The talks will explore the regulatory benefits of time alone in daily life, the profound health risks of social isolation, the role of time alone in our closest relationships, and the power of our beliefs in shaping the effects of time alone on wellbeing. By bringing together different perspectives on this issue, we aim to enrich the discussion on the effects of time alone on health and wellbeing, integrate existing knowledge, and identify future research directions.

Experience-sampling methodology (ESM) is a method that has been used in psychology for decades. By asking participants to complete surveys multiple times a day for several days, researchers can get a glimpse of how people live their everyday lives. This method also bridges the gap between personality and social psychology by exploring the individual in their everyday social environment. Technological advancements in the last 15 years have made ESM a more accessible and popular option for researchers, including social and personality psychologists. While the barriers have decreased, there are many complexities to designing an ESM study. This session explores some of these methodological considerations unique to ESM designs. There are measurement concerns that are different from other forms of surveys. There are also additional design features, such as when and how to sample people, that raise concerns. Finally, we also discuss the importance of participant burden, especially with vulnerable samples and diverse communities.

Professional Development Tools for Eliminating Racism in Workplaces and Communities

🕒 11:00 AM - 12:10 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 10, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

The Eliminating Racism in WorkPlaces and Communities (ERWC) Task Force of the Society for Personality and Social Psychology (SPSP) proposes to host a professional development session to introduce tools designed to support anti-racism efforts.

The Task Force curated a collection of resources, including three tools it developed, which have been publicly distributed via the SPSP website.

The first is a diagnostic tool for departments and organizations to annually assess their progress in fostering anti-racist and equitable outcomes. The second set of tools focuses on mentorship efforts. These tools include mentorship rubrics outlining best practices for supporting students and faculty of color and a rubric for individuals seeking mentorship and assessing their mentorship needs. Lastly, the Task Force created a video showcasing the lived experiences around mentorship, both positive and negative, from a diversity of SPSP community members.

By introducing these resources, the ERWC Task Force aims to empower individuals and organizations to actively work towards eliminating institutional racism and fostering inclusive environments in academia, community organizations, and workplaces.

We would appreciate your feedback after you utilize these tools.

Tools for Studying Dyadic and Group Interactions in Online Experiments

🕒 1:00 PM - 4:30 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 11B, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

There is a clear trend towards online experiments in the social sciences, especially with the advent of crowd-sourcing services such as MTurk and Prolific, which allow researchers to tap into large and diverse samples and run cost-effective, high-powered studies. However, since these platforms are designed to support individual (non-interactive) experiments, social psychologists studying dyadic and group processes face difficult trade-offs between restricting their methods to offline (lab) experiments, using deception, or paying for expensive programming services. In this workshop, we introduce two free and open-source tools (SMARTRIQS & SurvConf) that allow psychologists to design large-scale online studies featuring real-time group interactions and live text/audio/video chat, without having to learn any programming language. We will give a high-level conceptual overview of the features, capabilities, and limitations of these tools (1h), followed by hands-on demonstrations and activities (2h), and a Q&A (30 min). By the end of this workshop, members of the audience will become comfortable with setting up their own interactive studies online, regardless of their prior expertise.

Improving Peer Review Training with repliCATS

🕒 1:00 PM - 5:00 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 11A, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

The goal of repliCATS (Collaborative Assessments for Trustworthy Science) is to build capacity in peer review. This workshop offers formal training in peer review, using our structured elicitation and deliberation protocol. It also offers the opportunity for deliberate practice in conducting reviews. Over the session, we will evaluate a number of articles together, first privately, and then in groups, sharing information, providing feedback and the opportunity to recalibrate prior judgements. During the group discussions, participants will be encouraged to share information about their strategies for evaluating replicability, generalisability and other important indicators of credibility. We also explicitly discuss the importance of creating diversity in peer review communities to improve judgements of replicability and generalisability of results. In line with our commitment to diversity and inclusion, we will be offering (small ~US$120) travel grant cards to all participants to facilitate more equitable participation.

Planning a Productive and Enjoyable Sabbatical

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 10, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

Feeling daunted by the prospect of planning your sabbatical? From applying for a prestigious fellowship, venturing abroad, writing a book, revamping your classes, or simply seeking rest, the possibilities can seem overwhelming. Balancing family and financial needs often adds another layer of complexity. Responding to the uncertainties voiced by early career members who are considering a sabbatical, we aim to answer pressing questions and provide practical advice in this professional development session. Hear from Dr. Hehman who spent his sabbatical extensively writing and journeying across continents, Dr. Diekman who will compare her experiences of bringing her family out of state for one sabbatical and most recently completing a “stay-batical”, Dr. Muise who spent part of her sabbatical in another country, and Dr. Morling who will share her experience with sabbatical as a non-tenure track faculty member. Plenty of time will be reserved for audience Q&A.

Juggling the demands of rigorous and respectful real-world research

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 9, Upper Level

Professional Develop...

Social scientists are often encouraged to conduct rigorous research outside the lab and beyond convenience samples to better understand the human experience. However, ensuring this work is both replicable and respectful to the communities it examines can be incredibly challenging in part because open-science and community engaged practices may have competing values (e.g., transparency vs. protection). In this panel, four researchers at various career stages will share their experiences conducting work with communities in Africa and North America using open-science and/or community-engaged practices. We will discuss the value, tensions, and potential best practices of this research, raising issues such as: (a) using pre-registration and open-science practices in applied settings and with underrepresented populations, (b) forming and maintaining respectful and mutually beneficial community collaborations, and (c) balancing methodological demands (e.g., statistical power, internal validity) with a community's needs, capacities, and timelines. This session will help researchers consider the value and challenges of conducting rigorous and respectful research in the real-world.

What's Next?: Navigating Career Paths Post Grad-School

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 2, Upper Level

*Professional Develop...

Graduate students and early career researchers often have questions and concerns about the potential career paths available after completing their doctoral programs. However, the advice they receive from different sources can be conflicting and limited in scope. To address this, our professional development panel features panelists with diverse career paths in social psychology. This ensures a more comprehensive and holistic advice for attendees. We will discuss a variety of prospective career paths that can be pursued with a degree and training in social psychology, including post-doctoral positions, for-profit industry jobs, social impact roles, and research administration positions. The focus of the session will be on the qualifications and transferable skills needed for these fields. Through the panel discussion and Q&A, students will gain valuable insights into the various jobs both in and outside of academia, helping them make informed decisions about their future career plans. We are inviting 4-5 panelists and still finalizing the list of panelists.

Advances in Intersectional Stereotyping: Modeling the Perception of Multiply-Categorizable Targets

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 14B, Mezzanine Level

*Symposia

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Person Perception/Impression Formation

The current symposium reconciles perspectives on intersectional stereotyping—the stereotyping of others in light of multiple social categories. Two prominent person perception models for multiply-categorizable targets—MOSAIC (Hall et al., 2019) and the lens model (Petsko et al., 2022)—previously appeared at odds. In this symposium, we integrate the advantages of each model, increasing the utility of both frameworks for application in future research. The first speaker presents empirical work demonstrating the value of MOSAIC for modeling how intersectional stereotypes form. The second speaker presents experiments demonstrating the use of the lens model for explaining when intersectional (vs. singular) lenses serve as bases for stereotyping others. In the final talk, the presenter merges each model's strengths to disentangle conflicting findings in the intersectional stereotyping literature. We conclude by outlining remaining questions to propel the field toward a more holistic, inclusive understanding of the stereotyping of multiply-categorizable targets.

Culture

Methods/Statistics

Cultural psychologists seek to understand why societies differ and how they change over time. These questions can be difficult to answer with lab and online studies, but new computational methods allow us to answer these questions at an unprecedented scale. The first paper uses machine learning to uncover values that can accurately distinguish people from nearly 100 countries and to develop a new cultural values inventory that provides novel theoretical explanations for cross-cultural differences in behavior. The second paper uses machine-learning to explain country-level differences in rates of gun ownership and finds that greater acceptance of income inequality reduces support for gun control. The third paper uses computational modeling to boost the accuracy and precision of scientists' predictions of societal dynamics in a rapidly changing world. The last paper finds that social and moral values in 76 countries have diverged in the last four decades, with rich Western nations becoming more isolated from the rest of the world. Collectively, these papers demonstrate how computational methods help us gain a more nuanced understanding of culture.

Discrimination, Health-Promoting Reserves, and Health/Well-being in Global Context

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 10

*Symposia

Intergroup Relations

Mental Health/Well-Being

Evidence shows perceptions of discrimination can harm health, with most studies focused on groups in the United States (US). Less work focuses on high-status groups from racial minoritized groups in the US, marginalized groups in countries outside of the US, or groups from countries with high rates of social inequality. For whom and under which conditions discrimination affects the health of groups across contexts is understudied. This symposium presents four quantitative studies examining the impact of different types of discrimination on the health/well-being of global majority groups (Latinxs, Asian Indians, Chinese trans persons) across the top three most populated countries (India, China, United States). The studies also examine if and how individual difference factors (occupational status, health behavior) and cultural and identity-relevant health-promoting reserves (religion/spirituality, support of one's social identity) moderate associations. Overall, findings from the four papers have implications for interventions and policies to reduce exposure to discrimination and promote health across multiple levels – e.g., individual, organizational, cultural, and global contexts.

Does essentialism aggravate intergroup bias? If, when, and how

🕒 1:45 PM - 2:55 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 1B, Upper Level

*Symposia

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Social Cognition

Beginning with Allport, theories of essentialism—the belief that group membership is inborn and fixed—argue that it aggravates intergroup bias. We present new work questioning this claim from social cognition, cultural psychology, and child development. Talk 1 addresses an underlying assumption that physical differences (e.g., skin color) trigger essentialism: US participants (1693 adults, 286 children ages 4-10) expressed essentialist reasoning at equally low frequencies when groups varied in physical traits or clothing. Talk 2 presents cross-cultural data from the US and Brazil, showing that children (165 ages 5-12) initially believe race to be malleable and adults (213) only come to believe race is fixed in the US. Notably, anti-Black bias is common in both cultures, suggesting essentialism may not aggravate bias. Talk 3 presents 6 studies (2303 U.S. adults) in which increasing essentialism has no experimental effects on bias. Finally, Talk 4 spotlights anti-fat prejudice, an understudied group context with particular relevance to if and when essentialism aggravates bias. Data from US adults (141) and children (610 ages 4-11) show that essentialism instead reduces anti-fat bias.

Intellectual humility (IH)—the awareness of one’s intellectual limitations—is a growing research area. In this symposium, experts will present on where IH research is going next, exploring complexities and nuances of IH in different domains. The first speaker will present four studies examining IH among educators, looking at whether it is beneficial for students when teachers model IH, and how this might be moderated by the gender of the student. The second speaker will present four studies investigating IH in scientific communication, examining whether scientists who express IH elicit greater trust from the public, and whether this effect is moderated by the gender or race/ethnicity of the scientist. The third speaker will present four studies (including two longitudinal studies) on potential downsides of expressing IH in the religious domain, examining whether being humble about one’s most important beliefs can have negative effects on well-being. Finally, the fourth speaker will present a large longitudinal study examining whether engaging in difficult conversations increases IH over time. Together, these talks point to the far-reaching importance of IH across diverse contexts.

Lifespan Development

There is well-established evidence that personality and well-being are associated with cognitive health across the lifespan. Yet much previous work on such psychosocial factors and cognitive aging tended to have single studies or small sample sizes. In this symposium, we present four talks representing innovative, multi-study investigations of associations between psychosocial factors and cognitive health across more than 200,000 participants across 19 countries. Presenter 1 investigates how loneliness is associated with transitions between mild cognitive impairment, dementia, and death. Presenter 2 investigates whether eudemonic well-being (Sense of Purpose) is associated with cognitive transitions. Presenter 3 examines longitudinal associations between the Big Five and hedonic well-being with dementia diagnoses and neuropathology. Finally, Presenter 4 examines whether the Big Five can elucidate asymmetries between cognitive and brain health. We conclude with a panel discussion on next steps in utilizing personality and well-being as psychosocial risk and treatment factors in cognitive health.

Singlehood is on the rise. 38% of U.S. adults ages 25-54 were unpartnered in 2019, which was up from 29% in 1990. This symposium dives into the intricate landscape of singlehood, presenting several studies that seek to challenge prevailing "singlist" stereotypes. Drawing from diverse methodological approaches (e.g., cross-sectional, experimental) and analytic techniques (e.g., structural equation modeling, latent profile analysis), our panelists will probe the prevailing stereotypes, societal pressures, personality differences, and happiness indicators that characterize single life. Do single stereotypes differ by gender? Do single people have different personalities than their partnered peers? How do broader societal norms, like heteronormative pressures to be in a romantic relationship, influence singles' feelings of loneliness? How likely is it that single people will achieve happiness levels comparable to their coupled counterparts? Our symposium will tackle these questions and more. Together, these presentations shed new light on the singlehood experience, encouraging a more inclusive, nuanced understanding of what it means to be single in the 21st century.

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Social Cognition

Colorism is a form of discrimination that privileges lighter-skinned (vs. darker-skinned) individuals in a racial group. This symposium examines the mechanisms of colorism and its impact on intersectional targets. Talk 1 demonstrates that stronger explicit light=good/dark=bad metaphorical associations predict greater explicit and implicit colorism. Talk 2 examines how social associations of lightness and darkness vary at the intersection of race and gender and demonstrates pro-light skin tone bias exists across racial groups. Talk 3 examines how colorism becomes gendered, showing that skin tone is used to evaluate Black women (vs. men) to a greater extent when gender identity, norms, and expectations are salient. Talk 4 presents data from the beauty industry showing that food-related labels are used more for darker makeup shades and explores the impact of manipulating the food-skin tone association. Together, this research contributes to a fuller understanding of colorism. We provide evidence of its prevalence across groups, unique impact on intersectional targets, and ultimately, provide a deeper understanding of how this form of oppression impacts perceptions of people of color.

Democracy has declined globally in recent decades. Our symposium sheds light on the dispositions, attitudes, and ideologies that incline citizens towards anti-democratic sentiments and behavior, if these have an impact on democratic backsliding, and routes to promoting democratic behavior. The first project explores the dissonance between valuing democracy but behaving anti-democratically in 10 countries using immersive role-playing games, and identifies ways of increasing democratic behavior. The second project using American national surveys, highlights how partisanship intersects with ideology (cultural conservatism, economic leftism) to differentially predict anti-democratic orientation. The third project investigates if attitudes held by the citizens have a tangible system-level impact and finds that both aggregate level affective polarization and anti-minority prejudice predict institutional democratic backsliding in US states between 2008-2018. The fourth project tests a scalable misperception intervention in real-world settings (Facebook, community). Together, these projects provide psychological insight into factors that strengthen or weaken democracy.

Intergroup Relations

Diversity

These four talks use innovative methods to tackle some of the hardest questions about intergroup contact: the time-course of contact effects and how to implement it in the real-world. Talks 1 and 2 use experience sampling to study contact's effects on prejudice over time. Talk 1 tests an innovative "asymptotic" model of contact across multiple intergroup domains and finds evidence consistent with it; effects are strong for people with little prior contact but yield diminishing returns over time. Talk 2 distinguishes between- from within-person effects, a crucial distinction for causality and the asymptotic model, in the under-studied domain of political ideology. Talks 3 and 4 use longitudinal field interventions to study how contact can improve intergroup relations in the real world. Talk 3 uses Twitter bots to experimentally manipulate how many outgroup users participants "follow" on their real Twitter accounts and finds that this added contact reduces prejudice under the right conditions. Talk 4 uses a focus group and a longitudinal contact field intervention to improve racial and ethnic minorities' feelings of authenticity and belonging in public spaces.

There is an increasing recognition that the academic pressure to “publish or perish” is detrimental not only to the quality of science, but also to the wellbeing of scientists. In the wake of the pandemic, in a 2023 Nature survey 75% of researchers said they had dialed back their work efforts since March 2020, with the majority listing burn-out as the reason. Suggestions abound on how to solve this problem, with the most radical being to restrict the number of grants held, and articles published per researcher (Frith, TICS 2020). This panel will explore what ‘Slow Science’ might look like for Social and Personality Science. Panelists include Cindy Pickett, President Elect of SPSP and an expert in Diversity and Inclusion, and academics of different career stages, ranging from PhD level to senior scientists involved in university administration and leadership. Through discussion with audience participation the goal is to encourage attendees to reflect on if, and how, ‘Slow Science’ may be feasible for their own work (or not). We will also consider how such a move could be supported by professional organisations, and scientific gatekeepers such as journal editors and funding bodies.

Stereotyping/Prejudice

Lifespan Development

Despite the critical importance of Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics (STEM) for global innovation and problem solving, women continue to be underrepresented in these fields. In this symposium, we examine gender-science stereotypes in across development, their relationship to cognition and behavior, and strategies to reduce their impact. The first speaker will present evidence that 6- to 10-year-old children show science-gender stereotypes on implicit measures and this predicts girls’ perceptions of their own science ability. The second speaker will present data demonstrating that 7th and 8th graders’ learning of complex math strategies can be impacted by their stereotypes about math and gender. The third talk expands our knowledge of stereotypes about women in STEM by taking an intersectional approach and examining how gender stereotypes about math may negatively impact Asian women. Finally, the fourth speaker will present data from a multi-faceted intervention to increase adolescent girls’ forecasted fit in STEM fields. Together, these talks provide novel insight into our understanding of stereotypes about STEM across development.

Close Relationships

Norms and Social Influence

Interpersonal interactions are inherently dyadic: each person influences the other's experiences and behavior, and both people's experiences and behavior combine to shape relational outcomes. The predominant intrapersonal approach ignoring dyadic processes limits understanding of social relationships. Four talks illustrate distinct ways that actors and partners jointly influence social outcomes within two domains that are fundamentally dyadic: power and love. First, actor and partner power promote distinct social behaviors. Across 6 studies, low actor power inhibited emotional expressions, whereas high partner power elicited communal behavior. Second, relative power distribution in dyads determines trust. In 8 experiments, unequal-power dyads perceived more conflict of interest and less trust than equal-power dyads. Third, actors' and partners' love interact to shape behavior. In 8 observational and experimental sampling studies, partners feeling loved mitigated destructive behavior by actors feeling unloved. Fourth, dyadic processes interact with context. In 10 longitudinal studies, actors' and partners' behaviors interacted with stress to predict changes in marital satisfaction.

Physical Health

The deleterious effects of discrimination have been shown with respect to both physical and mental health, leading to outcomes such as higher inflammation, worse sleep, and worse general health, but also greater depressive symptoms and anxiety, and lower well-being. Together, this past work has highlighted the pernicious role of discrimination on health, yet additional work remains needed in order to further understand the boundaries of this relationship. The current symposium will focus on innovations in research on discrimination and health, examining which groups may be more or less impacted by these experiences of discrimination, which additional health and well-being outcomes may be impacted, as well as what methods we may be able to take to reduce the harmful effects of discrimination. Across talks, speakers will address these questions with diverse cultural samples from adolescence to late adulthood. Together, this symposium will highlight the ongoing research in the field of discrimination and health, conducting work that considers understudied minority groups, employs a multitude of statistical strategies, and explores potential new intervention strategies.

This symposium will highlight non-profit organizations that are taking strides in applying social psychology to solve real-world problems with measurable impact on society. The first talk will feature an organization that focuses on bridging partisan divides with empirically tested interventions (N = 4,800) that successfully reduce political polarization. The next talk will feature three studies (N = 36,325) led by a non-profit evaluating its work on equipping campuses, workplaces, and organizations with better tools and skills for constructive dialogue. The third talk will focus on a nationally representative survey collaboration between the first two organizations (N = 2,618) sharing insights into how to improve conflict and the climate of free speech on campuses. The final talk, led by a global environmental organization, demonstrates in a longitudinal experiment (N = 1,029) how climate messaging within fictional TV content can influence climate attitudes across multiple timepoints. Collectively, these talks will showcase leveraging social psychology to provide insights into today's most pressing issues, while also highlighting career pathways in applied, non-academic settings.

Sexuality

Norms and Social Influence

Social movements like #MeToo have brought a history of behind-closed-doors sexual violence to mainstream attention, highlighting the problematic responses that sexual assault cases receive. This symposium showcases recent research illuminating when and why people minimize, dismiss, and even refuse to intervene in sexual assault. Talk 1 indicates that individuals who are perceived as less prototypical (nonbinary people or women with higher waist-to-hip ratios) experience more victim blame compared to their more prototypical counterparts. Talk 2 shows that bystanders are less willing to intervene during sexual harassment when the target is less prototypical (masculine, transgender, or Black). Talk 3 reveals what is in the mind's eye when people think about targets of assault as victims vs. survivors vs. persons who have been assaulted. Talk 4 identifies a pattern in news media that contributes to victim blame wherein women who have been assaulted are attributed more agency than the men who assaulted them. Together, these talks shed light on how labeling and perceived prototypicality of sexual violence targets in our current social landscape influence credibility, blame, and justice.

Social Justice

This symposium gathers recent research on public responses to violence—both by protesters and the police—in social movements. Talk 1 examines how effective violent and nonviolent protests were in advancing the goals of the 2020 BlackLivesMatter (BLM) movement, concluding that disruptive protests within a nonviolent movement can sway those most resistant to social change. Talk 2 focuses on the violent repression of protests and finds that, for BLM and other movements, police violence against protesters backfires and erodes trust in authorities even in a partisan environment. Talk 3 investigates double standards in judging protest actions, showing that people judge the same controversial protest actions as more acceptable when the protesters' cause aligns with their own ideological position. Talk 4 tests how contingent Americans' judgements about political violence are on the severity and target of the act as well as the partisanship, race, and other attributes of the perpetrator. This panel combines geospatial, cross-cultural, and experimental methods with large and diverse samples to advance the burgeoning science on the effects of disruptive and violent collective action.

Diversity

Social Justice

The lack of inclusion of gender, sexual, and ethnic-racial minority group individuals in STEM is a pernicious problem in the United States. To address this issue, social psychologists are developing innovative theories and methods to bridge structural forces to psychological causes and mechanisms preventing diversity in STEM. Four lines of research highlight this work. Talk 1 will demonstrate that anti-LGBTQ+ biases in U.S. regions predict sexual minorities' lower STEM representation in those regions. Talk 2 will examine race-gender intersectionality in scientists' stereotypes, demonstrating that White and Black participants associate Black individuals (relative to White women) with fewer scientific traits. Talk 3 will demonstrate women's mental representations of women scientists and that they are perceived as less attractive and more competent than women non-scientists. Talk 4 will show that focusing on gender similarities reduces women's harmful perceptions of problematic masculine STEM culture. Collectively, the data from this symposium have implications for developing structural interventions that can promote STEM inclusion and thus the promise of diversity in STEM.

Responding to injustice: To punish, empower, or pay?

🕒 3:15 PM - 4:25 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 1B, Upper Level

Symposia

In this symposium, we examine the effects of perceived inequality on how people seek punishment for unfairness, when people engage in collective action, and when people engage in philanthropy. We discuss implications for economic and environmental justice.

Variability in moral judgements: political, ethnic, individual and value-based differences

🕒 3:15 PM - 4:25 PM, Feb 10

📍 Room 8, Upper Level

Symposia

Moral judgments are highly variable. This session considers how diverse individual-level factors (i.e., pain sensitivity, intentionality, political ideology, and ethnicity) and contextual factors (i.e., value domains) impact this variability. Furthermore, we discuss the implications of this variability for understanding hypocrisy, cultural appropriation, stereotyping, and political polarization

Culture

Applied Social Psychology

Environmental psychology is concerned with the interrelations humans share with their environments. These relations are inextricably linked to culture—how nature is perceived, how it's managed, and how people adapt to it vary widely across the world. However, less than 25% of articles published in this field even comment on culture's potential impact (Tam & Milfont, 2020). We are simply in the dark on some of the most important issues pertaining to the global impact of a changing climate. In this symposium, we present four projects that highlight various ways in which culture matters for environmental psychology. First, we explore how collectivism—a fundamental dimension of culture—can predict support for climate mitigation initiatives at the individual and country level. Second, we show evidence that across religious backgrounds, a spiritual connection with nature predicts greater moral concern for nature. Third, we explore how the link between patriotism and pro-climate attitudes varies across four high-emitting countries. Finally, a theoretical review of cross-cultural environmental psychology ties these themes together and provides insights for future research.
